Hon. GEORGE W. NORRIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in answer to that letter from the Attorney General, on March 10 I wrote a letter to that official, a copy of which I send to the clerk's desk and ask to have read for the benefit and information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

MARCH 10, 1940.

Hon. ROBERT H. JACKSON,
Attorney General of the United States,
Department of Justice, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. JACKSON: Your letter of March 1 in reply to my letter of February 22, relating to the activities of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, has been received.

In my letter to you, I referred to the activities of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and to the treatment of prisoners arrested in the so-called Spanish Loyalist cases in Detroit. I referred to these cases only to illustrate the general complaint which has been made against the activities of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

In your reply, you state, "I have reviewed the handling of Spanish Loyalist arrests in Detroit with the United States Attorney, with his assistant, and with the Federal Bureau of Investigation." Further on in your letter, you say you find "nothing to justify any charge of misconduct against the Federal Bureau of Investigation."

I desire most respectfully to call your attention to the fact that all of the complaints in these cases complained of the treatment of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the office of the United States Attorney at Detroit. If your investigation at the time you wrote your letter to me was confined to (as your letter would indicate), and had gone no further than, a review of the matter with the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the district attorney's office, then it would seem to me to be quite apparent that at the time you wrote the letter you had heard only one side of the controversy.

Since writing you I have had a conference with one of the men arrested in Detroit; also with the attorney who appeared (or tried to appear) in defense of the prisoners arrested at the time they were arraigned in court. I have before me, also, written statements of quite a number of the persons who were arrested in Detroit, 11 in all, 10 men and 1 woman. All of these persons were arrested between the hours of 4 and 5 o'clock in the morning. It is eminently proper, it seems to me, to reach a fair conclusion of the facts in the case that we should consider the nature of the crime with which these people were charged.

The crime charged was that they had violated the law in assisting or trying to assist men to enlist in the service of the Loyalist cause in Spain. There was no allegation that any of these persons were charged with having committed any heinous crime. There was no element of malice or anything other than a technical violation of law alleged against any of them. What it was alleged they had done was done by thousands of other citizens of the United States whose loyalty and patriotism have never been questioned. As evidence of the lack of criminality charged against these people it seems to me your dismissal of the charges (a highly creditable act) is ample demonstration.

The one woman taken into custody was arrested while she was in bed, compelled to dress practically in the presence of four or five Federal Bureau of Investigation men, and questioned almost constantly from the time of her arrest until she was taken into court at 3 o'clock in the afternoon. She was given only the vaguest idea as to the crime with which she was charged. She had no idea as to where she was being taken. She was frightened; she was dazed. She feared the men who were taking her away were a gang of kidnapers or hoodlums. She was taken to the ninth floor of the Federal Building and there turned over to a matron in charge. While this matron had charge of her, she was compelled to take off her clothing and put on a dress which the matron gave her. Her own clothing was then given to the agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation to be searched, and was later returned to her. She was subjected, as were all of the other persons arrested, to examination by strange men who asked all kinds of questions, all of which had a tendency to frighten and intimidate her.

It is fair to say that the men arrested were all given about the same kind of treatment as this woman. In one case, a doctor was awakened from sleep by the telephone, and his wife, who had answered the telephone, was told a man with a seriously injured patient wanted to see him professionally. His wife told the man to come up to their apartment and opened the door to let these men in. Immediately it was discovered there was no sick patient, that no professional services were wanted. Instead, the doctor was placed under arrest and handcuffed.

All of this happened in the presence of his wife, who was clothed only in her night clothes. She was suspicious that they were part of some kidnapping gang that was trying to arrest her husband, and she attempted to go to the telephone to call the police, but the Federal Bureau of Investigation men refused to permit her to use the telephone. She then wanted to call a lawyer, but again she was refused permission to telephone, and the doctor, handcuffed, was taken away.

Mr. Harold Hartley, with whom I have had a personal conference, was one of these unfortunate victims. He was an employee of the Federal Historical Records project. He was awakened by a loud pounding on the door. He tried to find out who it was. He was told it was F. B I. men and that they had a warrant for his arrest. He tried to get some information as to what he was charged with and what it was about. He asked why they attempted to serve the warrant at this unseemly hour, when he had a well-known place of business where he could be found at any time. He refused to admit them. They broke down the door, came in, put handcuffs on him before he was dressed, and then took him to the Federal building, where he was again stripped naked and his clothing searched. This treatment was given, not only to him, but to all of the others who had been rounded up in this raid.

Naturally, the wives of these men and the families and friends of those who were not married at once attempted to get an attorney to defend them. The prisoners were not allowed, until just before they went into court. to have the benefit of counsel.

The lawyer who was called by the wives and friends of the arrested people undertook to get in touch with the district attorney. This lawyer tells me he was given practically no information by the district attorney's office. He wanted an opportunity to talk privately with these clients. He was denied that privilege. He wanted to talk with the district attorney about the bail that was going to be demanded. He was not given an opportunity to go into any detail about this. The district attorney refused even to give him an opportunity to discuss it.

The prisoners were subjected to third-degree methods from the time they were arrested until 3 o'clock in the afternoon, when they were taken into court, methods which are not only disgraceful and indefensible, but which could have no other object in view except to break down, to intimidate, to frighten them, and to fill their hearts with fear and trepidation. All of these examinations were in the hands of the Federal Bureau of Investigation officials. All of the defendants were handcuffed, without any cause and without any reason. They were arrested at an unholy hour. There was no occasion for this, although in your letter you say it was necessary that these men should all be arrested at once, for fear some of them might escape. In fact, the presence of many of them could have been obtained simply by calling them on the telephone. The arrest of these people in the nighttime appears to be a part of the third-degree method by which all were intended to be frightened, intimidated, disconcerted, and reduced to a state of fear.

At about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, all of these prisoners were congregated in one room on the ninth floor, where they were not only handcuffed, but, with the exception of the one woman prisoner, were handcuffed together on a chain. In this condition, they were taken to a room adjoining the courtroom, which was on the eighth floor. For every prisoner there were at least two Federal Bureau of Investigation men as guards. Their handcuffs were taken off when they were marched into this room. It was while they were in this room together that their attorney was given 5 minutes to see them.

He had no chance to see any one of these defendants alone. They were surrounded by F. B. I. men who could hear everything that took place. They were denied all of the rights and privileges that our Constitution guarantees to every citizen, however humble. They were frightened; they were intimidated; and the conduct of the F. B. I. in thus handling them could have had no other object in view. The bonds demanded by the district attorney were outrageous. It was known in advance that most of these prisoners could not give the bond. They were taken out of the courtroom, and as they went out all were handcuffed again and the handcuffs fastened to a chain. After that I understand they were all turned over to the United States marshal's office.

It is my understanding that two, possibly three, of these people were Communists. However, this is no defense of the actions of the Federal Bureau of Investigation men. Even a Communist, under our Constitution, if charged with a crime, ought to be treated in a civilized manner. Our Constitution, according to my understanding, makes no distinction between men charged with crime. They are all entitled to have an attorney and are entitled to confidential communication with their attorney. They are entitled to fair, civilized treatment, but if these charges be true in this case, then the treatment accorded these people would be a disgrace, not only because it is a violation of the common impulse of the human heart but because it is a violation of our Constitution, that every citizen, regardless of his religious or political faith, shall be given equal justice and fair treatment.

Intimidation by third-degree methods is indefensible and is illegal, under our system of jurisprudence. The officers of the law, such as agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, ought to be the first to obey the law. They should not violate the very laws they themselves are supposed to uphold. Civil liberties mean that our enemies, as well as our friends, should be entitled equally to the protection of the law.

I know the evidence I have referred to in this letter is ex parte, and I realize, as every lawyer must, that we can never afford to render a decision on ex parte evidence alone. The other side must always be given an opportunity to be heard.

It seems to me, Mr. Attorney General, you have made the mistake of forming a judgment after hearing one side only. The things I have narrated above, it seems to me, present a good showing that the officials of the Federal Bureau of Investigation have sadly neglected their duty. However, I would not ask judgment on this alone. It seems to me your office ought at least to make an impartial investigation of what the truth is, and, when you find the truth, follow it, regardless of where it may lead you. It is no defense of the Federal Bureau of Investigation that it has accomplished many good things and has succeeded in ridding the country of some of its most obnoxious characters. It does not follow, because a human being has done a righteous and honorable thing, that he should therefore have license to disregard the very law he is supposed to enforce.

I am not, Mr. Attorney General, trying to insinuate or intimate that you will not do your duty as you see it. You know I have faith and confidence in your ability, in your wisdom, and in your courage, and if anything I have said can be construed as a criticism of your official action, I want it to be understood that it is constructive.

I am willing to submit it to you and to your judgment. If, after making an investigation fully and completely, an investigation such as you know well how to make and are empowered to make, you reach a conclusion, I shall have faith and confidence in that conclusion. I am not trying to insinuate that you are in any respect trying to avoid doing your duty. I believe an investigation should be made in this matter, and it seems to me you are the best-qualified person in our Government to make it. If the Federal Bureau of Investigation has exceeded its authority, you have power to curtail it and to keep it within bounds. And when you are in possession of all the facts, I have faith, and I believe, you will keep it within bounds and see to it that it performs its duty. All Government officials should not only do right, but they should do right in the right way. These Detroit cases are only examples. They are only illustrations that seem to me bear out the fact that the Federal Bureau of Investigation needs a strong, restraining hand to keep it within bounds. Nothing will go further in our country to bring about the destruction of communism, Hitlerism, and Stalinism than to have every one of our citizens know the law is going to be enforced, but that it is going to be enforced by humane, honest, legitimate, and constitutional methods.

Yours very truly,

G. W. NORRIS.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in response to the suggestion made in that letter, the Attorney General appointed one of his assistants to make an investigation of the various allegations relating to the Detroit arrests, although, as the Senate will notice, I called attention to the fact that the methods pursued in Detroit were, as I understood, only examples of the general practice of the F. B. I. In pursuance of what was his undoubted duty in the case, the Attorney General appointed Mr. Schweinhaut, one of his assistants, to make an investigation.

Mr. Schweinhaut went to Detroit and conducted a rather thorough investigation, and submitted a written report to the Attorney General. I had a conference with Mr. Schweinhaut before he went to Detroit, and another conference, lasting for about 3 hours, after he had made his report to the Attorney General, and before it had been given to the public.

I send to the desk the letter of the Attorney General of May 3, 1940, in which he encloses the report made by Mr. Schweinhaut, and ask that the letter be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 3, 1940.

HON. GEORGE W. NORRIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR NORRIS: I am asking Henry Schweinhaut to deliver to you the report upon his inquiry into the complaints about the arrests in the Detroit cases. He, having personally interviewed the defendants, agents, and witnesses, will be able to give you any detailed information you may desire.

There is always a wide difference of opinion over methods of law-enforcement agencies. Under any view of the matter, wide discretion must be left to officers in the field. They must act in the face of opposition and perhaps danger, and without opportunity for calm deliberation. That the agents in Detroit acted within their instructions and exercised their discretion in good faith seems clear to me. Under such circumstances they are entitled to my support.

I am, of course, anxious, as you are, that in law enforcement we do no violence to our traditional civil liberties. I am convinced that if those liberties are generally endangered in this country it is not by the F. B. I.

In weighing the general attitude of the Bureau, it is important to bear in mind that every agent acts under the probability that his conduct will be examined by shrewd lawyers for defendants, every confession may be challenged, and every act exposed in open court. The Bureau is thus under continuous and hostile examination.

Under this severe test of cases investigated by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and prosecuted as a result of its investigations, convictions are had in 96 percent. In the years since Mr. Hoover became head of the Bureau not one case has been reversed by an appellate court because of "third degree" or other improper treatment of defendants. These, to me, are very impressive facts, not only by themselves but in comparison with any law-enforcing body anywhere.

In an agency as large as the Federal Bureau of Investigation, errors of judgment and of overzeal will from time to time occur, and criticism is helpful both to the Director and to the Attorney General in avoiding repetition. But I am confident that the more the operations of the Bureau are explored the more it will appear that its vigorous and effective work for law enforcement is conducted with a fundamental purpose to observe the rights of defendants.

Yours very truly,

ROBERT H. JACKSON,
Attorney General.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to take sharp issue with Mr. Schweinhaut, who made the investigation and report, and with the conclusion reached by the Attorney General. Of course, it is well known that I am one Senator who has great confidence in the ability and courage of our Attorney General. I disagree with his whitewashing of what happened in Detroit, as shown in his letter. It is painful for me to discuss it and disagree with one in whom I have such great confidence as I have in the Attorney General.

I think a fair conclusion from the evidence taken by Mr. Schweinhaut must bear out the charge that the Federal Bureau of Investigation was guilty of conduct which ought not to be approved by the Attorney General, and which will not be approved, when understood, by all those who believe in justice and in the fair treatment of every man charged with a crime, be he black or white, great or small.

Mr. Schweinhaut says there is little dispute as to the facts in the Detroit cases. To begin with, it is admitted that the prisoners were arrested between 4 and 5 o'clock in the morning, when they were asleep. It is admitted that every one of them, with the exception of the woman prisoner, was handcuffed. It is also admitted that later they were handcuffed to a chain; but there is a dispute as to whether the handcuffing to the chain took place while the prisoners were in the custody of the Federal Bureau of Investigation officials or after they had been turned over to the United States marshal. Mr. Schweinhaut is of the opinion that they were not handcuffed to a chain until after they were turned over to the United States marshal and taken to prison, 20 or 30 miles away. To my mind, that point is of slight significance. Any man who has found it necessary to make a finding of fact when there is a dispute, or even when there is not much dispute, will readily admit that two men seeing the same thing will give different descriptions of it, even though they be equally honest.

Mr. Schweinhaut called my attention to one witness whose testimony I shall read to the Senate as having been a very fair witness, and one who made a favorable impression upon Mr. Schweinhaut. That witness insisted that he was handcuffed to the chain while he was still in the custody of the F. B. I. Mr. Schweinhaut thought that point was so important that he called him back and had another conference with him after his first statement was made, with the idea of laying before him facts in addition to those brought out by the F. B. I. agents, and with a view of having him admit—which Mr. Schweinhaut thought he would do if he were convinced—that the handcuffing to the chain took place after the F. B. I. men had turned the prisoners over to the United States marshal.

For the sake of argument, it seems to me, it may be admitted that the handcuffing to the chain took place after the prisoners were placed in the custody of the United States marshal. Such admission will not materially affect the facts or the conclusions which we ought to draw from the facts in the Detroit cases. To my mind the point is of very little importance, and not worthy of very much of an investigation, because whether a man was handcuffed to a chain or handcuffed without being fastened to a chain is immaterial. The humiliation and disgrace of being subjected to that kind of treatment are about the same in either case.

It seems to me that when we admit the facts as I have said Mr. Schweinhaut admits them to be we have made a very definite case against the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Mr. President, I know the popularity of the F. B. I. I know that its defenders are scattered all over the United States. I know what it means to make a charge of any kind against it. I have no desire to bring about the abolition of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. I have no desire to do that Bureau an injury of any kind. I wish that I might be understood as trying to help the Bureau rather than to injure it. In fact, I do not want to injure it, or to say anything that will be injurious to it.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. NORRIS. I shall be glad to yield in a moment.

I believe that the methods being pursued by the Federal Bureau of Investigation are wrong, and, if continued, mean the destruction of human liberty in the United States. I think the methods employed constitute a serious danger and they ought to be corrected and corrected now. I am sorry that the Attorney General does not see the situation in that light and realize that the activities of the F. B. I. ought to be curbed at the present time. Otherwise, as I see it—and, of course, I may be entirely wrong, I admit—but, as I see it and believe it to be, unless there is a correction, unless there is a rein put upon that Bureau, it will eventually mean the destruction in the United States of the liberties and the privileges we all like to say are guaranteed to every citizen under our flag by the Constitution of the United States.

I now yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MINTON. I understand there is no dispute about the fact that these people were all arrested at 4 or 5 o'clock in the morning.

Mr. NORRIS. There is no dispute about that.

Mr. MINTON. Is there any explanation for that unusual procedure?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; the explanation made by the Attorney General and also by Mr. Schweinhaut, who made the investigation, was that that hour was selected so that the men who were sought would all be at home and there would not be any likelihood of any of them getting away, and they would not be able to communicate with each other, and could be easily arrested.

Mr. President, I think we ought to consider the crime with which the men who were arrested were charged. It was not a heinous crime. What were the sympathies of Members of the Senate when the war was going on in Spain? We did not agree; there was great disagreement all over the United States among our people as to which side was right. Nobody claimed that any American citizen had to be on any particular side; nobody claimed, so far as I know, that an American citizen did not have the right to sympathize with Franco, on the one side, or the Loyalists on the other. Frankly, while my sympathies at the beginning of that contest were different from what they were later, when I thought the religious persecution had vanished to a great extent, my sympathies were with the Loyalist side. I have no fault to find with my brother who sympathized with and believed in the Franco side.

Those who were arrested in Detroit were enthusiastic probably in favor of the Loyalist side. One of the defendants, who was chained at that time, a young unmarried man, living, by the way, in the very house in which he was born in Detroit, had a brother serving in Spain on the Loyalist side. Of course, he was enthusiastic. These persons were charged with violating a law and were indicted and warrants were issued. The Federal Bureau of Investigation had the warrants to arrest these men, and had a right to arrest them. I concede there is nothing wrong with that; it was their duty to arrest them. But none of them were kidnapers; I do not know that any of them had ever been charged with theft, or robbery, or anything of that kind. Most of them were poor; most of them were laboring people; they had no money. Some of them were then being kept by the public; some of them were working for the W. P. A.

So far as I have been able to find, there was nothing to indicate that any of them were desperate or immoral or in any way vicious; yet they were all treated as though they were outlaws, as though those arresting them were afraid they might even kill their captors.

The first thing that was done was to handcuff them. That is admitted; no one denies it. They were all arrested in bed before they were dressed. Most of them were handcuffed before they had put on their clothes, and it was necessary to take the handcuffs off of one hand, at least, in order to permit them to dress. I think they were subjected to third-degree methods. That is denied, although it is admitted that they were subjected to questioning and all kinds of questions were asked of them. Some of them refused to answer. In some cases, after a stenographer had taken down the questions and what they had stated in response and the transcript was written up and presented to them in typewritten form they refused to sign it.

The men who were arrested continually asked why they could not call their wives, why they could not let their families know, why they could not have the benefit of an attorney. There were 12 of them. It is claimed on the part of the Attorney General and by Mr. Schweinhaut in his report that they had 15 or 20 minutes in which to consult a lawyer. The men who were arrested say they had 5 minutes. They were all together in one room, and they were told, "Here is your lawyer; you can consult him." The lawyer did not even know many of the defendants; had never seen them, but had been called on the telephone by their wives and asked to go there to defend them. The men who were arrested did not know him, and they said, "We had only 5 minutes," and all the time the F. B. I. agents were surrounding them, listening to every sentence, so that the lawyer had no opportunity whatever to have a confidential communication with a single one. I think that was a third-degree method.

I think they were questioned, although there is some dispute about it in the testimony, from 4 or 5 o'clock in the morning, when they were arrested, until 3 o'clock in the afternoon. Some of them were almost continually on the witness stand as they were questioned by one F. B. I. agent for a while and then by another. They were given breakfast and lunch. Most of the defendants, except the women, were stripped twice. They were compelled to take off all their clothes, and were examined thoroughly by a physician whom the F. B. I. agents had selected to make the examination. Later on in the day I think most of them were stripped again, and reexamined in the same way. I do not think that is decent treatment to give to men who were not charged with a heinous crime, who were doing what their own consciences told them was right. I do not think that can be considered to be anything except third-degree methods, and using "third-degree methods," the Supreme Court has held in a very recent case, does not necessarily mean that the prisoner is subjected to whip or club; he may be subjected to mental distress; and everyone knows that mental punishment is worse than any other kind. That applies to handcuffing and arresting one in bed and putting handcuffs on him before he gets out of bed.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. HUGHES. I just came into the Chamber and feel rather ashamed to confess my ignorance as to the crime with which these men were charged. What was the crime?

Mr. NORRIS. They were charged with attempting a conspiracy to enlist men to serve in Spain on the Loyalist side of the Spanish controversy. I have a copy of the law before me, and I am going to put the entire report into the RECORD. There will be found in the report a copy of the law, a statute of two sections, under which these people were charged with a criminal offense.

Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that the report of Mr. Schweinhaut be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report referred to is as follows:

REPORT TO THE ATTORNEY GENERAL CONCERNING INVESTIGATION OF ARRESTS AND SUBSEQUENT PROCEDURE IN DETROIT SPANISH RECRUITING CASES

In the Detroit recruiting cases 16 people had been indicted. At the time of this investigation 10 lived in Detroit, 1 in Milwaukee, and 1 in New York. Four were never apprehended by the F. B. I., and no attempt was therefore made to locate them for purposes of this investigation. Written statements were taken from all those who had been arrested; from relatives and friends who were present when the arrests were made; their attorneys; the United States attorney and United States marshal in Detroit, their assistants and deputies; the warden of the United States correctional institution at Milan, Mich.; an assistant United States attorney and the United States commissioner in Milwaukee; a physician and a matron who were temporarily retained by the F. B. I. in Detroit for the purpose of examination and care of the prisoners; newspaper reporters and photographers and an elevator operator who were present prior to and after arraignment; and every agent of the F. B. I. who had contact with the situation—comprising 98 statements in all.

Everyone, without exception, was cooperative and helpful; some, I feel sure, at considerable inconvenience to themselves.

I talked first with the individuals who had been arrested. Their Detroit attorney, Mr. Ernest Goodman, was present during the first two interviews. He then withdrew, saying he was entirely satisfied with the manner and thoroughness of the inquiry. He was very helpful in contacting the persons concerned, and his efforts expedited the investigation. Whenever it appeared from any defendant's statement that other persons had been present at the time of arrest, it was requested that the defendant have them contact me. Each one assured me that would be done. Though all of them did not appear, the request was not renewed, since there was either no substantial dispute about the facts or their statements would have been merely cumulative. Those relatives who did appear provided no new facts, their statements being substantially in accord with those of the defendants.

When the statements of the defendants and their relatives were ready, they were delivered to their attorney, who obtained the signatures. In some instances they were returned with minor changes or additions.

BACKGROUND OF THE CASE

In February 1938 the F. B. I., having received information that recruiting activity in behalf of the Spanish Loyalist cause was being carried on in Detroit, conducted a preliminary investigation and presented the results thereof to the United States attorney in Detroit. The United States attorney transmitted the preliminary report to the Criminal Division of the Department in Washington. Thereafter, the F. B. I. was instructed to complete the investigation. When concluded, the matter was, on instructions from the Department of Justice, held in abeyance until December 1939, at which time the United States attorney was instructed by the Attorney General to present the facts to the grand jury immediately. The grand jury was scheduled to convene the second week in January 1940. The United States attorney consequently directed the F. B. I. to reopen the investigation of the case, and this was done. A number of agents were assigned to ascertain the whereabouts of the witnesses and subjects in order that the case might be made ready for presentation.

THE INDICTMENTS AND COURT PROCEEDINGS THEREUNDER

The grand jury commenced its hearings on January 18, 1940, and on February 3 returned an indictment charging 16 people with conspiracy to violate the statute against enlisting persons in this country to fight in foreign conflicts. The 2 statutes involved read as follows:

"Title 18, United States Code, section 22, Enlisting in foreign service: Whoever, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, enlists or enters himself, or hires or retains another person to enlist or enter himself, or to go beyond the limits or jurisdiction of the United States with intent to be enlisted or entered in the service of any foreign prince, state, colony, district, or people as a soldier or as a marine or seaman on board of any vessel of war, letter of marque, or privateer shall be fined not more than $1,000 and imprisoned not more than 3 years: Provided, That this section shall not apply to citizens or subjects of any country engaged in war with a country with which the United States is at war, unless such citizen or subject of such foreign country shall hire or solicit a citizen of the United States to enlist or go beyond the jurisdiction of the United States with intent to enlist or enter the service of a foreign country. Enlistments under this proviso shall be under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War.

"Title 18, United States Code, section 88, Conspiring to commit offense against United States: If two or more persons conspire either to commit any offense against the United States, or to defraud the United States in any manner or for any purpose, and one or more of such parties do any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, each of the parties to such conspiracy shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 2 years, or both."

The indictment was impounded by the court because it was believed that if it became public knowledge some of the defendants might flee, with consequent delay in bringing the case to trial. Because of departmental instructions for a speedy trial, the district attorney felt that the possibility of fugitives should be strictly guarded against. This seemed especially desirable, since a grand jury witness (who claimed to know the defendants well) had stated that in his opinion if the defendants were made aware of the indictment in advance of their arrest some of them would go to Mexico, where, he said, a number of former members of the Loyalist Army were then resident.

Warrants of arrest were issued by the court. Ten arrests were made at 5 o'clock in the morning; one defendant (who lived in Canada) was arrested at 7 a. m. when he reached the American side of the Detroit-Windsor Tunnel; one defendant was arrested in Milwaukee at 4 a. m. (5 o'clock Detroit time); four were never found.

On the day of the arrests the grand jury returned six additional indictments in each of which one or more of the defendants in the conspiracy case was named. These indictments charged the defendants with enlisting men for service in Spain, in violation of the enlistment statute, supra.

Those arrested in Detroit were arraigned on all of the indictments at 3 o'clock in the afternoon. Upon the advice of their counsel, they stood mute—not guilty pleas were entered by the court, and bail was fixed. Following is a list of the defendants, the number of indictments against each, and the bail set:

Joseph Clark, 3	$10,000
Leon Davis, 1	20,000
Frand Feldt, Jr., 2	20,000
Harold Hartley, 2	20,000
Peter Kowal, 2	20,000
Mary Paige, 2	10,000
Philip Raymond, 7	20,000
Dr. John Rosefield, 2	2,500
Rudolph Schware, 4	10,000
Dr. Eugene Shafarman, 4	2,500
Robert Taylor, 4	10,000

Dr. Rosefield and Dr. Shafarman posted bond immediately and were released. The other men were committed in default of bail to the United States Correctional Institution at Milan, Mich. Mary Paige was committed to the Wayne County Jail in Detroit, the institution designated for the temporary confinement of Federal women prisoners in that area.

In Milwaukee, Dr. Lendrum, who was named in two indictments, was given a hearing before the United States Commissioner at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. The Commissioner was advised by the special agent in charge of the F. B. I. that he understood the judge in Detroit desired bail in the sum of $5,000 for Dr. Lendrum and that amount was fixed. In default of bail he was in custody overnight, posting the required amount the following afternoon.

On February 16, 1940, the cases were dismissed upon instructions of the Attorney General for reasons which he announced, and the defendants were released forthwith.

THE ARRESTS IN GENERAL AND PROCEDURE IN CONNECTION THEREWITH

The special agent in charge at Detroit and an inspector of the F. B. I. from Washington decided that the defendants should be arrested simultaneously in their homes at 5 o'clock on the morning of February 6, and thereupon secured approval of the proposed procedure from the F. B. I. headquarters at Washington.

Accordingly, on February 5, a staff of 46 agents was assembled and instructed in detail substantially as follows: Four agents were to be assigned to the arrest of each defendant; they were to attempt to gain entrance to the residence as quietly as possible so as not to arouse neighbors; they were to identify themselves promptly by showing their badges and exhibiting the warrants; they were to direct each defendant to dress himself immediately and were to search his clothes in advance; the defendant was to be handcuffed and two agents were to conduct him to the F. B. I. field offices; the agents were not to permit any telephone calls to be made while they were in the respective residences; in order to avoid argument and delay they were not to discuss the case or the facts at that time; they were immediately to search the premises for any evidence connected with the offense charged; they were to be courteous at all times; upon arrival at the F. B. I. offices, handcuffs were to be removed, fingerprints and photographs were to be taken, and each defendant examined by a physician called in for that purpose. Each defendant was to be given what he wanted to eat. Agents were to interrogate the defendants concerning the offense charged, after first advising them that they were not compelled to answer questions and what they said could be used against them. No questions concerning the political affiliations, race, or religion of the defendants were to be asked. Another physical examination was to be given following the questioning.

The same plan and instructions were to be followed in Milwaukee.

The arrests were made at the hours indicated above and when Assistant United States Attorney Thornton (in charge of the Detroit case) was notified, he conferred with the judge and found that the first available time for arraignment was at 3 o'clock in the afternoon at which time a case then on trial could be suspended for that purpose.

Mr. Goodman, the defendants' attorney, had endeavored during the forenoon to consult with his clients at the F. B. I. offices but permission had been refused. Early in the afternoon, Mr. Thornton arranged with the marshal that a room across from the courtroom be made available to Mr. Goodman for conference with the defendants in advance of arraignment. For approximately 15 minutes he did confer with them in the presence of the Bureau agents.

The defendants were brought from the F. B. I. offices on the ninth floor to the room above-mentioned on the seventh floor. An agent was on either side of each defendant. They were all handcuffed except Mary Paige. The elevator made about three trips in the course of the transfer.

In court, the handcuffs were removed, the charges were read and each defendant pleaded as he had been advised. The district attorney recommended that bail be fixed at $20,000 each, with the exception of the two doctors, for whom he recommended $2,500 each. These amounts were objected to by Mr. Goodman after again conferring briefly at the bar with his clients. The court then fixed the bail as hereinbefore listed and committed the defendants to the custody of the United States marshal. The F. B. I. agents, having completed their assignment, returned to their offices, and had no further contact with the defendants.

The four deputy marshals who were assigned to take the prisoners, handcuffed the men to a long chain and transferred them to the marshal's office. There, in accordance with standing regulations they were again fingerprinted. While in the marshal's office, their attorney and some of their relatives conferred with them, after which they, with other persons in the marshal's custody, were driven to the correctional institution at Milan. Mary Paige, as before stated, was taken to the county jail.

CONCLUSIONS

While there are some points of difference between the statements of the persons arrested and the arresting officers, such as the treatment accorded the defendants, the case is singularly free from dispute on the facts. The following is a résumé of what occurred, grouped with relation to the various incidents about which complaints have been made, together with my conclusions.

THE HOUR OF THE ARRESTS

It has been a frequent practice of the Federal Bureau of Investigation to effect arrests in conspiracy cases simultaneously. This procedure reduces the possibility of having to seek fugitives, since the defendants have no opportunity to warn each other. Police experience has established that simultaneous arrests can best be assured early in the morning when it is most likely that people will be at home.

Preliminary surveillance was undertaken in order to ascertain what hour of the day or night was most likely to find all of the defendants at home. This investigation disclosed that the daily routine of the defendants fitted into no regular pattern. One was unemployed, one was secretary of the Young Communist League, one had his own decorating contracting business without an office, two were on W. P. A., one was a waitress, one was educational director of the International Workers Order, three were physicians, one was a representative of a W. P. A. union, and one was employed by a supply company as a yard foreman. Ten lived in Detroit, one in Milwaukee, and one in Windsor, Ontario. Few remained at fixed places all day; all arrived home at different hours of the night (for example, one came home at 2:30 a. m. on the day of the arrest); each left his home at a different hour in the morning, some quite early; the physicians, of course, might receive emergency calls at any hour of the day or night.

The F. B. I. desired to make the arrests at the residences of the defendants both because they were more likely to be found there at the same time and because the investigation indicated that if any of them had in their possession any documents or material with which the alleged offense could have been committed, such material would probably be in their homes. The agent in charge considering all these circumstances determined that 5 o'clock in the morning would be the safest time. Under the circumstances the selection of this hour for the arrests seems perfectly justifiable.

It should perhaps be pointed out that had the arrests been effected at night the defendants would have had to be held in custody for a longer period of time and adequate sleeping quarters would not have been available except in a jail.

FORCING ENTRANCE

In all but two cases entrance was gained without difficulty, agents either knocking at the door or sounding a buzzer and being admitted to the respective residences without incident.

In the case of Mr. Hartley in Detroit, the door was forced by two agents pushing their shoulders against it. Notwithstanding the agents had exhibited the arrest warrant and their badges by standing at a window and throwing a flashlight on them, Mr. Hartley and his wife were frightened and apprehensive that the men were really a gang of hoodlums bent upon harm. He stated that experiences that he had had and events of which he was aware in connection with the labor movement gave him cause to fear for his safety. Therefore he told the agents that he would not open the door and that if they were F. B. I. men they could arrest him at his work later in the morning. He was thereupon warned that they would have to break the door but he replied they would have to do that; he would not open it.

In Milwaukee Dr. Lendrum's fears were much the same. He stated that when he was associated with a labor union in Detroit a roommate of his had been threatened with kidnaping and bodily harm because of his union activities. Notwithstanding that the agents had done all they could to identify themselves, the doctor was in doubt about their identity and was concerned for the personal safety of his wife and himself. He told the agents to wait until he had dressed, thinking to gain time and to telephone the police. The agents replied that they would not wait and proceeded to force the door.

The agents forced the doors upon refusal to open in these two cases because they feared either the possibility of escape or of communication with the other defendants. There seemed to be no other alternative to this action and it therefore must be considered reasonable under the circumstances.

SEARCH OF THE RESIDENCES

Upon gaining entrance, two agents immediately commenced a search of each residence. In some cases all rooms in the house were searched and in others only those rooms occupied or used by the defendant who was being arrested. Most of the defendants protested, demanding search warrants. Some agents replied that they had a right to search without a warrant as an incident of the arrest; others replied that they were merely following instructions. Some of the material taken away did not belong to the defendants and the agents were so informed. However, they felt they should not take the word of the defendants' relatives without question and that the material should be temporarily taken to the F. B. I. offices for examination. This, they assert, was in order to expedite their departure and more efficiently to catalog the documents taken. Some of the defendants say their rooms were left in a disorderly condition; others that the agents replaced everything. The agents insist the residences were not unnecessarily disturbed. It would seem inevitable that some disorder should have resulted from a thorough search.

The material taken consisted of pamphlets, letters, photographs, ledger sheets, index cards, passports, various lists of names and telephone numbers, notebooks, memoranda, and literature having to do with Spain and the Loyalist cause, the Communist Party, the Abraham Lincoln Brigade, the American League for Peace and Democracy, and some miscellaneous data.

At the office the agents carefully checked and cataloged each piece to determine whether it could have been used in the commission of the offenses charged in the indictments. That which was believed to be the property of persons other than the defendants and that which was believed irrelevant to the offense was returned.

Dr. Rosefield gave the agents permission to search his office and Mr. Taylor, who lived in Windsor, gave permission to search his home.

The searches and seizures in this case were conducted in full accord with the regulations of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and with advice which had been received from an assistant United States attorney. Hence there can be no doubt that the agents believed their procedure was entirely proper. An examination of the decisions demonstrates that it is by no means clear to what extent an arresting officer, without a search warrant, may go. However, the Supreme Court of the United States, in the last case it considered on the subject (United States v. Lefkowitz, 285 U. S. 452), seems to have limited this right more than did the earlier cases, and, applying the reasoning of that case to the facts here, it is apparent that some of the material taken would not come within the catalog of seizable matter as outlined by the Supreme Court therein.

REQUESTS TO COMMUNICATE WITH COUNSEL

Most of the defendants demanded permission to telephone their attorneys both before they were taken from their homes and while they were in the F. B. I. offices. Save in one instance, no one was permitted to use the telephone at all while the agents were in the residences. This exception was in the case of Frank Feldt, where there was a great confusion owing to attempts by his family to prevent the search. His mother and brother particularly insisted the agents had no legal right to do so, and each would interrupt the agents when they attempted to explain. Mr. Feldt's brother, therefore, was permitted to telephone a lawyer in the belief that he would be advised against resistance. The lawyer advised the Feldts to object, but if the agents insisted to permit the search to be made.

At the F. B. I. offices two of the defendants were permitted to make telephone calls. Dr. Shafarman says he was permitted to call his office and leave instructions concerning his professional business, but was not allowed to call a lawyer or his wife. The agents maintain that he was allowed to call both his wife and his secretary. Mary Paige was allowed to telephone her employer. Mr. Clark was advised by the special agent in charge that while he would not be permitted to telephone his wife, an agent would call her if he desired. This he refused. Mr. Hartley asked agents to call his wife and request her to send a necktie and his wallet. This they did and other agents brought these articles to him.

Attorney Goodman, who had been retained by several of the wives, called on the United States attorney in Detroit some time during the morning and requested permission to see Dr. Shafarman and one or two others. The district attorney said he understood the men were in the custody of the F. B. I. and called the agent in charge, informing him that Mr. Goodman desired to see some of the defendants. He was told that the agents had not finished their interrogation and other routine, but that as soon as that was finished it would be agreeable for Mr. Goodman to interview them. This information was given Mr. Goodman, who thereafter called at the F. B. I. field office. He was told he could not see the defendants at that time, that arraignment had been set for 3 o'clock, and that arrangements would be made for him to see those of the defendants who wanted him before that time. The discussion between the attorney and the agent in charge was rather heated, the one demanding to consult with his clients and the other insisting he could not do so. Each says the other was discourteous. As set forth above, Mr. Goodman did see his clients prior to arraignment. After arraignment and while the defendants were in the custody of the marshal, Mr. Goodman saw them again. He also was permitted to see Mary Paige at the jail, and he was allowed to confer with the men while they were in the United States correctional institution at Milan.

In Milwaukee Mr. Geline, who had been retained by Dr. Lendrum's wife, called at the F. B. I. offices during the morning and asked to see his client. Permission was refused. Mr. Geline says he was discourteously treated, and no reason was given for the refusal, nor would the agent in charge tell him what the doctor was charged with. The agent in charge says he told Mr. Geline he would have to get permission from the United States attorney to see Dr. Lendrum and that the district attorney would also tell him what the charges were.

He says Mr. Geline was impertinent and insulting in his manner. At all events, permission to confer with the defendant was refused at that time. The agent in charge thereafter telephoned Assistant United States Attorney Koelzer, who said that it was entirely agreeable to him for Mr. Geline to see the doctor. The agent then called the attorney who returned to the F. B. I. offices and conferred with his client some time before noon.

Mr. Geline had been apprised by Mr. Koelzer of the offense charged prior to the Commissioner's hearing. Whether the agents had so informed Dr. Lendrum is in dispute, but it is clear that he learned the nature of the charges from the questions asked him and that he was informed by his counsel when they conferred at noon. Mrs. Lendrum copied the indictment in the United States attorney's office the same day.

In Detroit the indictment had been impounded, as stated heretofore, but Mr. Goodman was informed by United States Attorney Lehr of the nature of the charges during the morning. Assistant United States Attorney Thornton referred Mr. Goodman to the clerk of the court for a copy of the indictment when it should be released. (It is the practice in the Federal court in Detroit for counsel to obtain copies of indictments from the clerk and not from the United States attorney.)

It was necessary, during the period of time the defendants were in custody of the F. B. I., that certain routine steps be taken, such as fingerprinting, photographing, informal booking of the defendants, physical examination upon arrival and again before departure, inventory of their property, and the service of two meals.

A review of the foregoing statement concerning the attempts of the defendants to communicate with counsel shows that in Milwaukee Dr. Lendrum was allowed to confer with his attorney 2 hours prior to arraignment and that in Detroit the defendants were permitted to consult with counsel 15 or 20 minutes before arraignment. I think the time allowed in Milwaukee was ample, but that the opportunity afforded in Detroit was insufficient.

USE OF HANDCUFFS AND CHAIN

All of the defendants, except Mary Paige, were handcuffed when they were arrested, eight as soon as they finished dressing, and three when they left their homes and out of the presence of their families. The handcuffing of persons upon arrest is a recognized and customary police practice, in order to secure the custody of the prisoner, to protect the safety of the arresting officers, and to guard against the prisoner attempting to harm himself. That this practice is sound is illustrated by the fact that about 2 years ago an F. B. I. agent arrested a man on a misdemeanor charge, failed to handcuff him at once and was killed by his prisoner.

Of the 11 persons arrested in Detroit, 2 say that no chain was employed by the F. B. I. at any time; 1 says he cannot recall, 2 that to the best of their recollection they were handcuffed to a chain by F. B. I. agents, and 7 are rather definite that the chain was used. Everyone else present, agents, assistant district attorneys, deputy marshals, newspaper reporters and photographers, the operator of the elevator in which they were transferred, the physician and the matron all say no chain was used by the F. B. I. Mr. Goodman, when first interviewed and while giving a general picture of what had occurred, said the men were brought downstairs by the agents handcuffed to a chain. Later, when I informed him the evidence to the contrary was overwhelming, he said he couldn't be positive and since so much had happened that day he could be mistaken.

It is clear to me that the chain was not employed at any time by F. B. I. agents.

After arraignment, when the defendants were turned over to the United States marshal, the men were handcuffed to a long chain by his deputies and removed to the marshal's office on the ninth floor. The chain was used again when the defendants and other prisoners were taken to Milan, some 40 miles from Detroit. The chain is always used by the marshal's office when there are more prisoners than there are deputies to handle them, as was the case here, there being 10 men to transfer and only 4 deputies.

While I am unprepared to recommend a substitute for a chain in situations such as this, I do feel that an attempt should be made, in the interest of human dignity, to find some other method, except in extraordinary cases.

INTERROGATION OF THE DEFENDANTS

Following the routine of photographing, fingerprinting, physical examination, and breakfast, the defendants were questioned off and on until lunch time. A few became drowsy from time to time and dozed. The interrogation was intermittent, not constant. One of the defendants says he was told to tell them what he knew "or else." This is entirely inconsistent not only with the statements of the agents, but with those of the other defendants who say they were told they did not have to answer and that no attempt was made to compel a statement. Some of them talked freely, others refused to answer questions concerning the case or other defendants, and still others refused to make any statement until they had consulted with counsel. Most of the defendants say they were not questioned concerning their political affiliations, but some say this was done. The agents deny it, saying that where this issue was raised at all it was injected by the defendants themselves, one of whom said that he believed he was being arrested only because he was a Communist. The evidence is conclusive that the defendants were adequately informed of their right not to incriminate themselves and that no compulsion was used to make them do so.

TREATMENT OF THE DEFENDANTS

The comment of the defendants and their relatives on the conduct of the agents and the treatment accorded them varies. Some say they were courteous; others that they were not discourteous, but blunt; others that they were sometimes polite, sometimes sarcastic; some that they were brusque; some that they were ill-mannered; others that they were sometimes frigidly polite and sometimes contemptuous. The agents say that they had been especially instructed to be courteous to the defendants and that they carried out those instructions. They say that the defendants, for the most part, were themselves in good humor and cooperative after the shock of the arrests wore off.

Specific allegations of mistreatment or improper conduct on the part of the agents are few, and they are so inconsistent with the general pattern of the arrest procedure that they can be given little credence. In some instances the inaccuracy of the allegations is demonstrable. Thus, the wife of one defendant claims that the agents did not permit her husband to take with him his eyeglasses. A newspaper photograph clearly shows him holding the glasses and it was admitted that no one gave them to him while he was in custody.

The woman defendant says that anyone would have known she was in poor health, but that notwithstanding this the agents "grilled" her in an intimidating manner. Both the physician and the matron (the latter being in attendance upon her during the entire time that she was in the Detroit field office of the F. B. I.) say that there was nothing the matter with her; that she had told them she felt fine, and that the agents treated her with every courtesy. She slept for awhile. The agents say she seemed to treat the whole thing lightly and the deputy marshal who took her to the jail said she joked about the proceedings. Reporters were allowed to visit her at the jail, she posed for photographs and her statements to the reporters were flippant. However, she complained of her treatment in the jail. When she gave her statement, she did not impress me as a reliable or credible witness. The statements of others only confirmed that impression.

The arrest procedure clearly shows that all of the agents had the same instructions. All of the prisoners were interrogated in the same suite of offices with doors open. In some cases two defendants were questioned in the same room. Having these circumstances in mind and having personally interviewed everyone concerned, observed their demeanor and reactions, compared allegations with undisputed facts and reasonable probabilities, I am satisfied that no defendant was treated differently from the others in any material degree and that the conduct of the agents is not subject to justifiable criticism.

OCCURRENCES AT THE CORRECTIONAL INSTITUTION

The defendants arrived at Milan too late for the regular evening meal and sandwiches were substituted. The customary institutional routine was followed—regular clothing exchanged for prison garb, physical examination, fingerprinting, and bath. Each was given a declaration sheet, which is the routine form used in all detentions and covers information as to relatives, marriage, education, and employment history. This information is necessary in order to supervise visits, gives the warden power of attorney to care for the property on the inmate's person and to censor mail. It is also used for parole purposes.

The defendants refused to fill out these forms completely because they feared to implicate their relatives. They took the position that they were not convicted felons and should not, therefore, be compelled to fill out parole forms. They were told, pursuant to detention regulations, that they could not have visitors or mail until the forms were completed. The next day, Wednesday, their attorney saw the warden and, since the prisoners had not been convicted but were awaiting trial, an arrangement was made whereby they would not be required to give all the information called for in the schedules. On Saturday—a regular visiting day—one of the defendants was allowed to see his mother, he having filled out the papers in their entirety. The other defendants were not permitted visitors. They were of the opinion, as were their relatives and friends, that they had complied with the arrangement to which the warden and their attorney had agreed. Their visitors protested vehemently that the defendants were being discriminated against and remained at the institution for 6 hours demanding to see the defendants. Mr. Goodman again contacted the warden and the next day visitors were allowed. No further difficulty arose. It is plain that the failure to permit visitors on Saturday was the result of a misunderstanding and that no discrimination was intended.

In all other respects, the regular institutional routine was followed and no particular objection has been raised concerning it. It fact, Mr. Raymond said that it seemed a model institution, adding, facetiously, that if one had to be confined he would recommend Milan.

MISCELLANEOUS

Some suggestion has been made that the defendants were stripped of their clothing in order to intimidate and harass them. As stated heretofore, they were given a physical examination when they first arrived at the F. B. I. offices and another when they were taken to the courtroom. This is a routine practice of the F. B. I. whenever persons are taken into custody. This regulation was adopted for the protection of persons in custody who are suffering from ailments requiring special treatment, to guard against infection and to insure against false accusations of mistreatment. They dressed immediately following each examination. This procedure is not only justifiable, but desirable.

It has been alleged that the defendants were deliberately exposed to photographers while they were chained. There is no basis for any such complaint. Newspaper photographers were present outside the courtroom, as is always the case when any event takes place which they think has news value. No pictures at all were taken while the men were in the custody of the F. B. I. and after arraignment, when the marshal took them over, the routine procedure was not altered in the slightest degree in order to facilitate the taking of pictures.

BAIL

Charges have been made that bail in these cases was too high, and in that connection that the attorney for the defendants had not been able, in the time allowed, to equip himself to make adequate representations to the court in that regard. He made no request of the court that arraignment be postponed but did argue that bail in lesser amounts than recommended should be fixed.

The court set the bail in varying amounts after hearing the suggestions of counsel on both sides. The fixing of bail, being a judicial function, does not properly come within the purview of this inquiry.

HENRY A. SCHWEINHAUT.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think as Mr. Schweinhaut looks at the question, and as the Attorney General looks at it, the report is a very fair presentation of the case. Mr. Schweinhaut thinks that it was perfectly proper to handcuff these men, and to arrest them in the dark hours of the night. He thinks that was not a denial of civil liberties. I do not agree with him at all. I am surprised that any citizen of the United States, believing in human liberty, can for a moment condone the action of the F. B. I. agents who arrested these men. There were 46 F. B. I. men engaged. There were always about four F. B. I. men to one of the others, and yet the poor one guarded by four armed men was handcuffed so that he could not do any damage.

Mr. Schweinhaut, in his report, mentioned a case. He thinks it is necessary to handcuff men in that way because it is said that several years ago a man was arrested for some crime, and he was not handcuffed, and he pulled out a revolver and shot the man who had arrested him. I suppose that sort of thing has occurred. I have no guaranty that when I start from the Capitol and go over to the Senate Office Building I will not meet, on the way, some man who will shoot me down; but if I should see somebody coming, would I be justified in saying to a policeman who happened to be near him, "Handcuff that poor devil, so that he will not shoot me while I am going into the Senate Office Building," because 2 years ago some man like that did shoot down some fellow without any provocation whatever?

I do not see any sense in such a proceeding. I do not see any reason why, for the protection of those enforcing the law, such a procedure is necessary; and I am sorry that so bright a man and apparently so good a lawyer as Mr. Schweinhaut is, and so great a man as the Attorney General is, should dispute a proposition of that kind.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. DOWNEY. Was any pretense made that any of these men were known to be of a dangerous character?

Mr. NORRIS. None whatever; and later on, when I get through with some of this evidence, I am going to take up another case which happened in my own State about the same time.

Mr. President, while it may be tedious, I am now going to read the evidence of some of these persons. The facts are nearly the same in every case.

Here is the case of a man by the name of Frank Feldt, Jr., 6742 Seneca Street, Detroit, Mich. I will read the interrogatories, although without giving the name of the questioner or the defendant questioned. The man who was asking the questions is Mr. Schweinhaut, and Mr. Feldt is doing the answering:

Mr. S. How old are you?
Mr. F. Twenty-six.
Mr. S. Are you married?
Mr. F. Single.
Mr. S. Were you born in Detroit?
Mr. F. Yes; in the same house where I live now.
Mr. S. Have you lived there all your life?
Mr. F. Yes.
Mr. S. Do you live with your family?
Mr. F. Yes. Two brothers, one sister, my mother, and father.
Mr. S. Are you working?
Mr. F. I am now unemployed due to this investigation.

I digress there to say that this man is an illustration of those who lost their jobs on account of the activities of the F. B. I.

I was working at Dodge's. I was fired on January 3. A week previous they carried on an investigation at Dodge's, and I was called down to the office, and Mr. Moore wanted to know where I was from 1937 until December 1939. While questioning me, he had a form that he was following, and he would ask me questions from that form. The questions mostly revolved around whether I left the country in the past 2 years. My brother was in Spain. In order to prove I didn't leave the country, I had to bring identification dating between June 1, 1937, to December 13, 1939. I was working under an assumed name at Dodge's (Frank Shultz). I explained that the reason I was working under an assumed name was that I was blacklisted by the Chrysler Corporation in 1934. At that time, 1934, I was employed by the Dodge main plant, and I joined the Auto Workers' Union assigned to the Trade-Union Unity League. So after I had successfully proven to Mr. Moore that I didn't leave the country, he had to take it up with the plant management for final disposition. So this occurred on the Friday before Christmas, about the 22d. At 4 o'clock I received a notice of dismissal. So I took it up with the chief shop steward. He took it up with the management, but since I didn't have seniority in the plant, the management pointed out that the union had no jurisdiction as far as union bargaining in the plant was concerned, so the only alternative was to have the union start Labor Board proceedings against the company. At that time I didn't know anything of the forthcoming arrests or that my dismissal from the Chrysler Corporation was due to the arrest that followed.

Mr. S. Have you worked since then?
Mr. F. No.

Mr. S. Have you been a union organizer at all?

Mr. F. Well, not an organizer. I've been a union man ever since I've worked; taken part in union activities.

Mr. S. Do I understand that you went to Spain?

Mr. F. No. My brother went to Spain.

Mr. S. Were you active in the Friends of Abraham Lincoln Brigade?

Mr. F. Yes.

Mr. S. In what respect? What position did you hold?

Mr. F. Oh, a chauffeur. Helped to raise funds; took speakers around the city.

Mr. S. What education have you had?

Mr. F. Up to the twelfth grade in high school.

Mr. S. Have you been a member of the Communist Party?

Mr. F. Yes.

Mr. S. Have you ever been arrested?

Mr. F. Yes.

Mr. S. What for?

Mr. F. Minor things. During the depression I was picked up for investigation, never had any charge put against me.

Mr. S. Were you ever convicted?

Mr. F. In 1934 I got a suspended sentence due to a little difficulty I had with a police officer about 3 months previous. There was a strike at a cigar factory near where I live. I wanted to inquire what it was all about; we never had a strike in that neighborhood since I've lived there. There was an officer stationed there, and he didn't like people to come up and talk to the pickets. So we got into a little discussion with each other. One thing led to another; he told me to move on, and so I moved down the street. I knew a girl who worked in a bakery, and I stopped to talk to her. This officer came up and said, "Didn't I tell you to move on down the street?" I said, "I did move down the street." So one thing led to another, and he arrested me and took me to Connor Precinct station. I explained to the desk sergeant, and we got to arguing——

Mr. S. You got a 30-day suspended sentence for loitering, then?

Mr. F. Yes.

Mr. S. Is there anything further about your own background that you would like to tell me now?

Mr. F. The only thing—I have gone to school here in the city all my life. I have been a delegate to the Michigan Youth Congress in 1935. I've been interested in youth activities. I belong to several youth organizations like the Youth Congress, Y. M. C. A.; I went to a S. E. R. A. school conducted at the Y. M. C. A.

Mr. S. Is your home a house or an apartment?

Mr. F. A single frame house.

Mr. S. Will you tell me, then, in your own way, what happened on the morning of February 6?

Mr. F. Well, I waked up; it was about 4:30 in the morning. I was sleeping in an upstairs bedroom. Two men who identified themselves as F. B. I. men waked me.

Mr. S. Were they in your room?

Mr. F. Yes.

Mr. S. How did they get in?

Mr. F. My mother let them in after they threatened to break down the door if they weren't admitted. My sister told my mother to let them in and see what they want. So my mother opened the door. They came up to my room. They said they were Federal Department of Justice men, and they had a warrant for the arrest of Frank Feldt. They asked if I was Frank Feldt, and I said I was. So they said, "Well, get your clothes on." They said they were taking me downtown. I asked to read the warrant. It had the title number, section, code, etc.—United States Code, or something. I went downstairs to put on my clothes. Both of the men followed me downstairs. I had my clothes in a downstairs bedroom. They asked me if those were the clothes I had been wearing. I told them yes. So they said to put them on. After I put my clothes on I asked them what this section and code really was. They said you will find out when we get down to the post office downtown.

Mr. S. Did they tell you what clothes to put on?

Mr. F. They asked me if the clothes I was going to put on were the ones I had been wearing. They said to put them on.

They asked me for some identification, so I showed them this (showing Mr. Schweinhaut Continuous Discharge Book No. 215858).

After I had dressed, I said I was ready to go downtown. They said we weren't going downtown just yet. I said, "What's the delay?" In the meantime there were four officers in the house at that time, and two of them wanted to start searching the house. My mother objected. We wanted to know whether they had a warrant and what they were looking for. They said they were Department of Justice men and they didn't need a search warrant, the warrant for arrest gave them the legal right to search the house. One of the fellows, I didn't know their names, said he was an attorney at law and being an attorney he understood law and they had a legal right to search the house. That caused quite a fury in the house. We all objected, and they all insisted. We have a telephone and one of the Department of Justice men called up downtown and wanted to know what they should do. He said we were resisting them and wouldn't let them search the house. So I don't know what they told him, but in about 10 or 15 minutes several more Department of Justice men came down to the house. In the meanwhile I had been telling them I was all dressed and ready and why didn't we go on downtown, they had a warrant for me all right, but they didn't have any reason for bothering anyone else in the house. Let's go on downtown. When the other two or three came down to the house, immediately this one young fellow went up and told my mother, "Now we have orders to search this house and you can't deny us that privilege." So my brother had taken the telephone. One Government man wanted to take the telephone away from him. My mother shoved him away from the telephone, said we pay for it; we can use it in our own house. So my brother called Maurice Sugar, U. A. W. A.–C. I. O. attorney. Sugar was at home and my brother wanted to know whether they had any legal right to search our house. Sugar asked the details. My brother told him Department of Justice men were there to arrest me and had a warrant for my arrest. Sugar wanted to know how the warrant read. My brother asked for the warrant. So they gave it to him and he read it over the telephone. Sugar didn't know what that title of the code was. My brother asked one of the Government men to explain. They said what kind of an attorney have you got that he don't know any law. Well, my brother said we just wanted to know whether they had any right to search the house. Sugar said no, unless they had a search warrant that told what they were looking for. So my brother said that they insisted on searching. So Sugar said to object, and then if they insisted to let them search. So by that time these Government men had gone into a huddle and finally made up their minds to take me downtown, and so we went.

Mr. S. Did they make a search while you were still there?

Mr. F. No.

Mr. S. I take it that before they had taken you away from the house, everyone had awakened?

Mr. F. Yes.

Mr. S. Did they put handcuffs on you in the house?

Mr. F. No. After we were out of the house, at the front gate. One of them explained that my mother was so upset that they didn't want to upset her any more.

Mr. S. Were they rough in their treatment of anyone in your house, or were they courteous?

Mr. F. They were pushing around when my brother wanted to telephone.

Mr. S. Who pushed who?

Mr. F. Some Government man pushed my mother. He pushed her away from the telephone when she wanted to take the phone. So she pushed him back. This pushing around went on for about 5 minutes I imagine.

Mr. S. About how long were they in your house before they took you away?

Mr. F. Well, my sister had to go to work about 6 o'clock. These people were outside waiting for her. They must have been in the house from 4:30 to about a quarter to 6 o'clock.

Well they brought me down to the Federal building. They took me up in the elevator to the ninth floor. I had handcuffs on all this time. I was taken into a room and one of the Government men took the handcuffs off me and told me to have a seat. I sat down for about 15 minutes and then one of the Government men told me to come with him behind a filing cabinet. The doctor was there and he told me to strip. So I stripped and the doctor made an examination. He questioned me about every bruise and scratch. Then after I was examined he told me to put on my clothes and told me to take a seat again. I'm not sure whether they took fingerprints first or photographs. But they took both and then started to question me.

I digress here to say that photographs and fingerprints were taken of all these persons, of most of them twice, while they were in custody.

I continue the reading:

Mr. S. How many men left your house with you?

Mr. F. Two. About four stayed behind.

Mr. S. Did these two who brought you down to the Federal building stay with you during the time you were questioned?

Mr. F. Yes.

Mr. S. Did anyone else question you?

Mr. F. Yes; two others. The original ones who came to the house. Two or three hours later they came down town, and they had a bunch of so-called evidence they had taken from my house.

Mr. S. Did you learn the names of any of the men who arrested you and questioned you?

Mr. F. No. I have a good mental picture of four of them.

They first questioned me about my personal life: Where I was born, where I went to school, how far I went in school, and where I had worked. They asked what type of work I had been doing; why I was fired; whether I had any political affiliations other than I had told them; what I did with my leisure time. This fellow who was leading the questioning told me that if I wanted anything to eat all I had to do was ask, that it would be given to me. I had coffee and cigarettes.

Mr. S. Did you have breakfast?

Mr. F. No. I was going to have coffee with my sister but then they made up their minds to go down town. They asked whether I wanted breakfast, but I had been drinking beer the night before so I just wanted coffee.

Mr. S. Did they ask you about the Communist Party?

Mr. F. That came further on in the questioning. After they finished this personal questioning, they said, "Frank, we've gotten along very well." I answered all of their questions; I had nothing to hide. My records were an open book; they could look them up. They said, "Now, we are going to get along just fine; we just want you to keep answering the questions as you have, and to be very truthful." I said, "It all depends on the nature of the questioning that is going to take place." These other fellows had come with the evidence and three of them were checking it. They asked me if I was a member of the Friends of Abraham Lincoln Brigade. I told them I was. They asked for how long, and I told them actively about 3 months. I told them that the reason I was so much interested was because my brother was over in Spain. Then they questioned me as to certain people; whether I knew them or not. They had a form they were following. They named the other people who were arrested, although I didn't know at the time that they had been arrested. I told them the people I did know—Bob Taylor, Rudolph Schware, Harold Hartley, that's about all I did know. I had heard of the others, Philip Raymond, and others. I heard of Philip Raymond, he was an organizer for the U. A. W. in 1932 when the strikes were going on, and I was a member of that union later. He was still some sort of an organizer. They seemed to believe that I had some connection with them. They questioned me whether I knew Harry Katzin, Johnny Kesserling, Emmet Collier, and Bill Wright. They were veterans. I knew them because I met them at a reception after they returned from Spain. Duncan MaCrea spoke. They especially asked me, or told me, that I was supposed to have recruited Emmet Collier in the Friends of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade office, and I told them I did not. They said, "Didn't you and Pat Daniels state to him that the Friends was a recruiting agency for Spain and you could make connections for him?" I told them no. They said, "You are lying. Do you want us to bring Emmet Collier down here to prove it?" I said, "If you feel that it was necessary bring him down, I'm not trying to hide anything, so bring him down here." It seemed as though this questioning just centered around Emmet Collier and recruiting. One of the Government men brought over some things, a little blue notebook. I had kept notes from the 1935 Michigan Youth Congress and notes from the S. E. R. A. school at the Y. M. C. A. They wanted to know what these were. I told them just notes. What are they supposed to mean? They don't mean anything. They leafed through the notebook. I had taken Spanish and in it I had idioms in the Spanish language, and they wanted to know. I said, "That's enough of that." They took the notebook back and came back with a big poster I had from Spain with a picture of a drunken soldier. I couldn't make it out myself. They were especially interested in a letter I had from Ted Barrows from New York City. In this letter Teddy was talking about a girl he met. She belonged to the Young Communist League. He was very much in love with her. They questioned me about the Young Communist League. In the letter Teddy stated that, "She is all for the movement." They wanted to know what movement. They wanted to know what the movement was, and in his letter he mentioned a convention. She was a delegate. They wanted to know what that was.

Q. Did they ask you what organizations you belong to?

A. Yes.

Q. Did they ask about the Civil Rights Federation?

A. No.

Q. Did this questioning go on all morning?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you have lunch?

A. Yes; about 12 o'clock. I ordered some milk. I could order any food I wanted.

Q. Did they question you again in the afternoon along the same line?

A. Yes. They had a statement they asked me to sign.

Q. Did you sign it?

A. Yes; I signed it. It was just whether I knew some people mentioned, and if I worked at the Friends of Abraham Lincoln Brigade. A short statement.

Q. Did you at any time during the day in the office ask again for permission to call a lawyer?

A. Dr. Shafarman was in the same office with me. We were the only two who were together. The conversation could be heard. We were about 10 feet apart. Dr. Shafarman was asking to call, and they refused him. So I never even asked.

Q. Were you given a physical examination again before going to court?

A. Yes.

Q. Was that just before going to court?

A. Well, this physical examination took place, and then we sat around there until about a quarter to 3. Then we were all taken into a larger room in the same suite of offices. Then we were put on a long chain with handcuffs.

Q. All of you?

A. Yes.

Q. Were you handcuffed to another prisoner?

A. No; to a chain. These handcuffs were on a chain. The chain was in the middle, and there was one prisoner on each side of the chain.

Q. I am going to read the names of the 11 persons arrested that morning and ask you whether to your own knowledge each one was on that chain in the F. B. I. office that morning.

Philip Raymond? Yes.

Robert Taylor? Yes.

Rudolph Schware? Yes.

Joe Clark? Yes.

Mary Paige? No.

Harold Hartley? Yes.

Peter Kowal? Yes.

Dr. Shafarman? Yes; he was directly across from me.

Dr. Rosefield? Yes.

John North? Yes.

Q. Do you remember who was right in front of you?

A. I believe Bob Taylor was.

Q. You were taken out into the hall, where you waited for an elevator?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, did that chain connect all 10 of you, or were you in groups?

A. We were all together.

Q. Did you all go down to the seventh floor together?

A. Yes.

Q. And then you went into a little anteroom off Judge Moinet's courtroom?

A. Yes.

So we went into this little anteroom, and the attorney, Ernest Goodman, explained that most of our relatives, mothers, or wives, had called him up and had asked him to represent us.

Q. He is a partner of Maurice Sugar?

A. He has offices in the same suite of rooms.

Q. He told you what to do?

A. He told us to stand mute. He said he did not know what the charges were.

Q. Were you still chained together while he was talking?

A. Yes.

Q. When was the chain taken off?

A. We were led to Judge Moinet's courtroom doors and released one by one and led into the courtroom by the guard assigned to us.

Q. What bail was set for you?

A. Twenty thousand dollars and $1,000 personal.

After the arraignment we were taken one at a time out of the courtroom and chained on the chain, and taken to the marshal's office.

Q. Were you fingerprinted in the marshal's office?

A. Yes. We were taken off the chain and put in the "bull pen." Then we were chained again and taken to Milan.

Q. Now tell me about Milan, what happened there?

A. The only thing is that we were treated like criminals. We followed the prison routine with the other prisoners. The Saturday following our arrest, Mrs. Hartley, Mrs. Kowal, Mrs. Raymond, and my mother drove out to visit us. Wednesday morning they gave us forms to fill out. They were personal questions, and I felt, as well as the rest of the prisoners, that the form wasn't necessary to fill out, and we didn't want to fill it out until we saw the attorney. So Wednesday the attorney, Ernest Goodman, came out to visit us, and after we had told him about the correspondence forms he went to the warden. He said we could have visitors this week end, it wasn't necessary to fill these out to have visitors. He said when we filled out the forms we didn't have to fill out where we had worked, the only thing was to fill out the names of people we wished to correspond with. I did that. The following Saturday we did have visitors. We filled out the forms according to what the warden had told us. I was called out for a visitor, and my mother was there. She immediately told me that Mrs. Hartley, Mrs. Kowal, and Mrs. Raymond were there to visit their husbands, and the warden refused to let them. He refused to admit them because they had not filled out the forms correctly. I told her my form was filled out the same as the rest. I told her to tell Mrs. Kowal, Mrs. Raymond, and Mrs. Hartley how things stood. She told me what had transpired at home. They told her she could have a half-hour visit now. We were allowed 1 hour per month. The guard was in the room while we visited, and after our half hour was up he said to me that I was a nice young Finnish-American boy and seemed to be a nice fellow. He said you want to be careful of Raymond and Joe Clark and these Communists, you want to keep away from them. I said, "Well, obviously, I must be as bad as they are, I'm in jail with them. We have a mutual understanding, we are in jail for the same thing."

Q. Is there anything else at all that you think of now that you would like to add to this statement?

A. When the agents who had remained at my home came to the F. B. I. offices, they had with them not only my belongings, but personal effects of both my brother and my sister. I complained to them that they had no business taking property belonging to my family, but I got no satisfaction.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to read the testimony of Mr. Harold S. Hartley. I have seen Mr. Hartley, and I talked with him personally before I wrote the second letter to the Attorney General. I was impressed with his appearance. He is a modest man, intelligent looking, and well educated, if his story of his life is true. He does not give the impression of being a desperado and is perfectly courteous. I remember I asked him first whether he was a Communist, and he said he was not. I asked him whether he had ever been arrested, and he said frankly that he had been, that he had served 20 days in jail. He describes that in his statement. He said, in answer to the questions of Mr. Schweinhaut:

I am 32 years old, married, and was born in New York City. I studied at the University of Wisconsin. I received a literary scholarship from Zona Gale, Wisconsin authoress. I worked in New York, Wisconsin, and Detroit. I was welfare director of Local 174,

U. A. W. I was on the historical records project of the W. P. A. at the time of my arrest. My family on my father's side came to North Carolina from England in 1740, and my ancestors fought in Washington's army. Elizabeth Hartley was nurse to Thomas Jefferson. Capt. James Hartley fought for the Union in the Civil War. My father is a doctor in New York. He was a captain in the National Guard and served in the Spanish and World Wars. I was an assistant scout master in the Boy Scouts, and president of the Epworth League in the Memorial Methodist Episcopal Church in Yonkers, N. Y.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Are you a member of the Communist Party?

Mr. HARTLEY. No; I am not. I do not want to disassociate myself from the other prisoners—the others who were arrested when I was—on account of my political affiliations. I do not think it should be brought in, but I am not a member of the Communist Party.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Have you any criminal record?

Mr. HARTLEY. No; I have not.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. I understand you were arrested once for picketing?

Mr. HARTLEY. Yes. I, and about 9 others, were picketing a building in which was the Italian consulate in Milwaukee, Wis. That was in 1935, I think. We were protesting, peacefully, the invasion of Ethiopia by the Italian Fascist Government. We were arrested and sentenced to 20 days, either for disorderly conduct or obstructing traffic, I can't remember which.

That was his criminal record. Are there any Senators present who under the same circumstances might not have had the same kind of a record, a record of arrest for picketing the Italian consulate at the time Italy was capturing Ethiopia? It does not seem to me that that would have a tendency to show that this man was a bad man, that he was a culprit, that he was in any way disreputable.

I continue reading from Mr. Hartley's statement:

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Will you tell me in your own way what occurred from the time of your arrest on?

Mr. HARTLEY. I woke up early in the morning on February 6. It was still dark. I heard knocking on the front door. We live on the third floor, apartment 8, at 1151 Merrick. When I looked at the clock it was about 5 o'clock, or close to it. I said to my wife, "I wonder who that could be." I said, "I think it must be Pat McCartney and his gang." Pat McCartney was formerly, I believe, a worker in the Plymouth plant, who took active part in the Homer Martin faction of the U. A. W. during the trouble after the N. L. R. B. election established the C. I. O. in that plant. He was reported throughout the city to have led various attacks against C. I. O. Plymouth workers as they were leaving the plant or as they were going into the plant. It was Pat McCartney who led an attack against people coming from a meeting at Finnish Hall on November 9, 1939. In that attack about 60 or 70 people were quite seriously injured. Pat spoke there from a sound truck as leader of the attack. He also tried to get a group of people to break up a Chrysler picket line. A few weeks ago he was arrested for molesting three Negro women. In the ranks of the labor movement he is known as a person who is against labor leaders so I thought he might have decided to attack me, so my first thought on hearing those knocks on the door was that it must be he and his gang.

No one can get up to the third floor in our apartment ordinarily unless they press the button downstairs and someone answers in the apartment and presses the button which releases the door below.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. No one had buzzed?

Mr. HARTLEY. No. No one had, but they were at the door on the third floor, at the front apartment door.

I put on my bathrobe and hurried to our front door. I said, or rather I yelled because the knocking was so loud, "Who is it, what do you want?" I could tell that there was more than one person. They said, "Open up." I said, "What for, who is it?" They said, "Are you Hartley?" I said, "Yes; I am Hartley." They said, "Well, open up. We have a warrant for your arrest. We are from the F. B. I." I said, "How do I know you are from the F. B. I.? How do I know you are not Pat McCartney and his gang? I do not want to open up. Why don't you come at a more reasonable hour in the morning? I can be reached at work. I work near here for the Government. I will be glad to see you if you come over there, or wait until a more reasonable hour." They just repeated, "Open up." Then I said "Have you got a warrant?" Then one of them went around to the front porch. There is a front porch where you can approach one window of the living room. He waved a paper in the window. He said, "Come here and look at it." I went to the window. I could see what looked like a warrant with my name on it.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Was it dark then?

Mr. HARTLEY. It was fairly dark, but I could see it looked like a warrant and it had my name on it.

I said, "You have a warrant for my arrest maybe, but why didn't you come at a more reasonable hour?" Then I said, "Have you a search warrant?" They did not answer that question, although I yelled it a couple of times. Then I said, "Well, if you have no search warrant, you can wait a little later until I get dressed." One of them said, "We'll smash the door down then." I said, "Well, I can't help it if you do. If you have no search warrant, I will not open up." I walked away from the door toward the dining room. They just smashed the door in. They just smashed it in—it took the board out of the partition. They approached me and pushed me into a chair. I started to stand up again, but they just pushed me down. One of them put handcuffs on me.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Where was your wife?

Mr. HARTLEY. My wife was standing in the dining room.

Two more men came in from the back porch. One of them said for me to get dressed. I said, "How can I get dressed with handcuffs on?" They took off the one—the right cuff. My wife brought some clothes and I put on my clothes as best I could—the wrong trousers—trousers belonged to an old suit, and no tie. Then they led me to a car downstairs. One of them asked me why I thought it was Pat McCartney and his gang. I explained as I have to you. One of them took out some sort of identification card. It had his picture and name, etc., on it, and it seemed to say F. B. I., so I went with them without any difficulty.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. How many agents came into your apartment?

Mr. HARTLEY. I can't say. At least two from the front door and two from the back. I think there were three at each door, but at least two.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. When you were getting dressed, how many were there in your apartment?

Mr. HARTLEY. At least four.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Did you learn their names?

Mr. HARTLEY. I did not. I asked, but I did not learn their names.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. If I told you the names of the four, then, it wouldn't mean anything?

Mr. HARTLEY. No; only I think I could recognize the one who was the treasurer—the one who paid for the lunches.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Then, if I asked you if he was [reading four names], could you recognize which one he was?

Mr. HARTLEY. No. I could recognize him, but not by name.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. He was in your apartment?

Mr. HARTLEY. Yes.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. You dressed then with one handcuff on?

Mr. HARTLEY. Yes.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Did you ask them to take it off?

Mr. HARTLEY. Yes; I asked them. They refused.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. While you were still in the apartment, did you ask what you were charged with, or why you were being arrested?

Mr. HARTLEY. Yes. I asked them why they were arresting me. They said section 18 or 22 or something in the Federal Code. I believe that was on the warrant.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Did they tell you what that meant?

Mr. HARTLEY. No.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Did you ask them to permit you to telephone an attorney?

Mr. HARTLEY. Yes; and my wife asked also. They did not allow me to telephone anyone.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Not anyone?

Mr. HARTLEY. No.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. While you were still in your apartment do you know whether they made any search of your apartment?

Mr. HARTLEY. No; except just to look around. They didn't actually handle anything.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Did they inquire whether anyone else was living in the apartment?

Mr. HARTLEY. Not while we were there.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. While you were there, did your roomers awaken?

Mr. HARTLEY. One, a woman, awakened. I told her not to worry about it, just go back to bed.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. You have two roomers, man and wife?

Mr. HARTLEY. That's right.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Did you make any protest after they had entered your apartment?

Mr. HARTLEY. Only that I protested against this violation of civil rights. I demanded the use of the telephone and time to get dressed properly.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. What do you mean when you say, "time to get dressed properly"?

Mr. HARTLEY. Well, first of all, to be allowed to go to my room to get dressed. They said, "No; you stay right here in the dining room. As much as possible, have your wife bring in the same clothes you were wearing when you came home." My wife brought in my coat, trousers from a different suit. First I put on my shoes, then needed socks. I asked if my wife could bring me socks, and they had to discuss that before they finally allowed her to bring me my socks.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. What do you mean, "had to discuss it"?

Mr. HARTLEY. Oh, one asked the other, "Is it all right?" and they finally said it was all right. They had to discuss it before they let me put them on. I had no tie when I went down. They were rushing me so. I had no chance to shave.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Did you ask them to let you shave?

Mr. HARTLEY. Yes; that's right. I was not allowed to.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Did any of them treat you roughly?

Mr. HARTLEY. Only the first time when they pushed me into a chair. I started to get up and they pushed me down again.

Then they led me down stairs into the car. I sat in the back seat. There were two in front and one beside me in the back. They went to the Federal Building and parked on the west side of the building. As we got out of the car one of them poked something sharp into my left side. It may have been a revolver. There was no reason for their poking a revolver in my side, I went along without any difficulty as soon as I was sure they were F. B. I. agents. I was handcuffed, too.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Did he keep it there?

Mr. HARTLEY. Until we got in the elevator. Then he removed it.

We came into a room on the ninth floor on the southeast corner of the building. I was led into an office and asked to take off my clothes. They took personal effects out of my clothes, a notebook, etc. One man examined me, looked me over, my body. They also took my blood pressure with one of those apparatus. Then they told me to get dressed again. However, they kept the personal effects. They wrote down the personal effects taken from me and I signed a note saying these are the personal effects taken. I was seated at a table with three of them—the number changed; sometimes there were four or five.

When we left the apartment I noticed that at least two of them remained behind at the apartment. Two went with me and two stayed behind.

Each of the F. B. I. men had a yellow pad and a pencil. They pushed a pencil over to me and said, "Maybe you want to write something." I said, "No; I guess not." Then they began to question me. I answered the first three or four questions, although I did not believe that they had any right to ask these questions until I had first seen a lawyer. I asked them if I were under indictment, and if I was going to be brought to court. They said "Yes." I asked them, "What is it about; what am I charged with?" They just said, "It's something about Spain," without going into particulars. Then I said, "If I am under indictment, I do not want to answer questions until I have seen an attorney." Then I asked if I could telephone the Civil Rights Federation. They said "No."

Mr. S. What was your purpose in wanting to call the Civil Rights Federation?

Mr. H. My purpose in desiring to call the Civil Rights Federation was to get a lawyer. I asked if I could telephone my wife, because she was worried. They wouldn't let me. I asked if they would phone my wife and tell her to bring my tie and wallet. I didn't have my wallet. They said they would, and I guess they did, because later, when the other agents came down from the apartment, they brought my tie and my trousers from the same suit—I had the wrong trousers from an old suit—and my wallet.

Mr. S. You said you answered three questions; what were they?

Mr. H. Well, first was about my wife. Was that my wife? I told them she was my wife. When and where were we married? I told them here in Wayne County in 1936, at the courthouse. Then I told them when and where I was born, or, rather, one of them stated that he had seen my birth certificate, and mentioned the date of my birth, and I confirmed it. Then there was one other question I answered about where I was working. I told them I did not want to answer any more questions, and that I had a right not to answer. I asked repeatedly to call the Civil Rights Federation in order to get a lawyer, but this was refused and ridiculed.

Mr. S. What do you mean, "ridiculed"?

Mr. H. Some just laughed. Some said, "So you want to see a lawyer, eh?" Sometimes they were polite, but most always they were sarcastic.

Mr. S. Did you refuse then to answer any more questions?

Mr. H. Concerning the case, I did. As I remember, we did talk about other matters. They did ask me questions, but I didn't answer their questions. Sometimes I might answer, but it didn't answer their questions. Some others that were in prison were led through the room, and while they were being led through one of the F. B. I. men would ask, "Do you know him?" or mention his name and ask if I had heard of him before. I refused to answer these questions, but once in a while I would make a remark, but no direct answer to the question.

Mr. S. Were you sarcastic, also?

Mr. H. I think I may have been once in a while, but on the whole my attitude was polite but firm. I did not want to answer questions until I had seen an attorney. I may have been sarcastic on one or two occasions in trying to evade their questions.

Mr. S. What efforts did they make to compel you to answer their questions?

Mr. H. Merely repeating the questions over and over again. Going back to the same question after I had stated I did not want to answer. No threats or physical violence. A couple of times they stated it would be better for me if I did answer. They were continually insinuating that if I had nothing to be guilty of I would not be afraid to answer questions; if I was innocent I would be glad to answer.

Mr. S. Did they say in what respect it would be better for you?

Mr. H. No; they did not.

Mr. S. You said a moment ago they asked you about different people and things. What other things did they ask you about? For example, did they ask about any organization?

Mr. H. Yes. They asked me about the people who lived in my house—who they were. They asked me several questions regarding the nature of the International Labor Defense. How many members, whether it was a national organization, with whom affiliated, how it was financed. They asked me several questions about the Civil Rights Federation. How it was organized, how many members, what organizations belonged to it.

Mr. S. Did they ask its purpose?

Mr. H. I think so.

Mr. S. Anything at all about the Communist Party?

Mr. H. I don't think they asked anything about the Communist Party, as I remember. I just can't recall, but I don't think they did.

Mr. S. Do you think of any other questions they asked you?

Mr. H. I think they asked me something about the U. A. W. union. Just some general questions. They asked me questions about Philip Raymond—asked me if I knew him—how long. They asked me if I knew Elmer Johnson, the head of the Communist Party in Michigan. They asked me what I could tell about him, although they didn't say anything about his being a Communist. They just asked about him. As far as I know, they asked me no questions at all about enlisting anyone for Spain.

Mr. S. Did they tell you that was what the case was about?

Mr. H. They said it was something about Spain.

Mr. S. Did you get the impression that they did not know what it was about?

Mr. H. Well, one of them did say it was getting people to go to Spain. I am not sure. They didn't seem to want to tell me what I was charged with specifically. They didn't ask me about whether I ever recruited people for Spain or a single question about any activities regarding Spain.

Mr. S. They never asked a single question on that subject?

Mr. H. No.

Mr. S. Were the same agents who arrested you the ones who were questioning you?

Mr. H. Yes. Some of the agents who came to the house may not have been in on it. But three or four who were at the house were questioning me. In the main, the same ones who were at the house questioned me here. Once in a while other agents would come into the room and sit down for a while.

Mr. S. Were any other prisoners being questioned in the same room you were in?

Mr. H. No; not in the first room I was led into. Once I was led into a room to the west of where I was first being questioned and in that other room there was one or two people questioning a Joe Clark. And then the agents asked me questions in that room for a while. I believe for about a half an hour, then they led me back. At times they took me to a lavatory. They took me through a long, bigger room toward the southeast corner of the building. In that room at least two or three people who seemed to be questioned by agents. Individuals surrounded by two or three others. One I knew was Dr. Shafarman.

Mr. S. I take it you were fingerprinted and photographed?

Mr. H. I was fingerprinted. They evidently did the rest and took photographs.

Mr. S. Did you make any attempt to resist?

Mr. H. No.

Mr. S. Were you served breakfast and lunch?

Mr. H. I asked about breakfast. They said order what you want, and they sent out for it.

Mr. S. Approximately what time was that?

Mr. H. Approximately 9 o'clock.

Mr. S. What about lunch?

Mr. H. They ordered lunch at 1 o'clock. I had lunch about a quarter to 2. I kept asking to use the phone and to get shaved. They refused.

Later, it seemed to me late in the afternoon, but now I know it wasn't, I was led into a long room on the southeast corner of the building and was told to get undressed to be examined. I had to sit down and wait. I noticed while waiting there was a room further on. The door was open. Once in a while a woman would come out. I noticed afterward that this was the room where Mary Paige was led from. I mention this because when I got undressed and was examined by someone and my blood pressure was taken, I was getting dressed when the woman came into the room—the matron in charge of Mary Paige—with a number of the prisoners and at least 15 or 20 F. B. I. men.

I might interpolate there the fact that Mary Paige was the one woman in all this gang which was arrested.

This woman walked through the room. At least three of the prisoners were in various stages of undress. I believe that Bob Taylor was practically naked. I just mention this because it seemed very peculiar for these matrons to walk back and forth through there. Then after we were dressed, after all of us had been examined, I was seated back in a corner of the room near the door where Mary Paige came out. The treasurer of the group who had arrested me was seated by my side or standing near all the time. I call him the treasurer because when they ordered the food, the lunches, he gave them the money to pay for the lunches. I saw him give them some money. Finally I was told to get up. They put handcuffs on me. Then I saw they were slipping a chain through them.

Mr. S. Who put the handcuffs and the chain on you?

Mr. H. The one who was seated by my side. He was one of the original agents who arrested me, and was engaged in the questioning.

They put handcuffs on me and I noticed I was fixed to a chain in some manner. We were lined up single file, and each one of us was handcuffed on the chain. I do not know how many were on that chain. I do not think the girl was on the chain, but we were lined up on the north side of that office on the southeast corner of the building. At a signal, we were told to move forward. We went out the door. It seems to me we went in another room before we were led into the corridor. We waited for an elevator, and were taken down. It was very difficult to get into the elevator, we had to back way around to get in. F. B. I. agents followed us into the elevator. Someone kept hold of my left arm. The same person, treasurer of the group who arrested me, followed me on the left side while I was chained. He followed me and grasped my left arm every once in a while.

Mr. S. Eleven of you were attached to that chain?

Mr. H. I don't know. It seems to me most of us were on that chain. I am quite sure there were 11—all of us but the girl. She was not on the chain.

Mr. S. Were there any photographs taken?

Mr. H. While we were in the corridor? No. None with flash bulbs. I did not notice any flash bulbs. When we came toward the room where we saw Mr. Goodman there was a large crowd.

Incidentally, I should say here that Mr. Goodman was the lawyer whom their wives and friends had sent down to try to represent them.

We were led single file. They made way for us to get through the crowd. I can't tell if any pictures were taken or not. But I don't remember noticing flash bulbs.

We were then led into a small room packed with people. Someone began to take the handcuffs and chain off. Suddenly I noticed Mr. Goodman. He said he was allowed 5 minutes to talk to us. So he started talking to us, although the F. B. I. men were all around. He said our wives had called him up and asked him to represent us, and he asked us to confirm it. We all confirmed it except Dr. Rosefield, who had another attorney. We said to him it would be all right. He stated he did not know what the charges were, only the section of the code, and therefore he would not plead guilty or not guilty, but would stand mute, and then the judge would enter a plea of not guilty. I told him it was all right for him to say that for me. If I remember, we were without chains and handcuffs then. We were then led into the courtroom of Judge Moinet. We were led to the northwest corner of the room and sat down there. I noticed that a number of the F. B. I. men sat in the courtroom. I don't know whether all of them were there or not. When what I suppose they call "arraignment" took place. I was placed under $20,000 bail. I had no time to tell the attorney about myself, how I was born in the United States, and so forth. The judge set $20,000 bail. Someone stated—I don't know whether it was Mr. Lehr or Mr. Bugas—they had found it very difficult to locate us. That included me, too, I suppose. They certainly must have known that I was working on W. P. A. right across from the F. B. I. offices on the ninth floor. It would be easy to see the head of the project there. The very fact that I am here today quite willing to discuss the thing shows that it could have been done then, too, without the methods used. We still are under threats in the newspapers; columnists like Walter Winchell are protesting, asking that our case be prosecuted. Therefore there is just as much reason today to be afraid to come down as then, if that entered into my judgment. I just want to state that I would have been perfectly willing to come down to answer questions; it wasn't necessary to break into the apartment at 5 in the morning.

I was unable to pay $20,000 bail and I was again led away with the others. Just before we left we were lined up again. Who put the chain and handcuffs on after the arraignment, I don't know. I am not sure. I was excited, there was such a crowd around us. Photographers were there taking pictures. My wife was crying. I tried to take hold of her hand. We were led through the corridor to the elevator. We were taken to the United States marshal's office and put in the cell. The chain was taken off in the marshal's office. The chain was put on us again and we were led through the corridor in chains—nine of us—taken in the elevator down to the basement and put in a truck, still in chains. The truck was locked. Inside the truck we were still handcuffed and chained. There were effects which were still with the F. B. I. I did not get them back until after I left Milan.

Mr. President, the remainder of this man's testimony relates to his treatment by the United States marshal. At this point in his testimony he tells that they were turned over to the United States marshal.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the condition of this man, a married man. His wife had come down to see him before he was taken to prison. He was innocent of any crime of magnitude; at least, he had not been proven guilty of any crime whatever. He was unable to give $20,000 bail, and when he was about to be taken away, among the spectators who had come he saw his wife. He attempted to take her hand but could not do so. He attempted to kiss her farewell as he was going to prison without any opportunity of having even a word of confidential talk with her, much less with the attorney who had his case in charge. It seems to me that such a situation should appeal to the heart of every man who loves liberty. I think such things ought not to have the approval of the Attorney General or of the F. B. I.; indeed, they ought not to have the approval of any civilized man. Yet Mr. Schweinhaut in his conversation with me says that he thinks the F. B. I. was justified in putting chains and handcuffs onto every one of these men. That is their formula; that is what they always do. They put handcuffs on before they find out even whether or not they have got the right man. They handcuff him, make him helpless, scare him, arrest him in bed at night, put him through third-degree methods all day, deprive him even of the opportunity of saying good-bye to his own wife, to his own mother, as they did in the case of Mr. Feldt.

I think such practices are deplorable; to my mind, they are detestable; and if the F. B. I. pursues that kind of methods in arresting anybody against whom a charge is made, then the F. B. I. ought to be reformed; and it seems to me it is up to the Attorney General of the United States to see that reform is brought about. I regret that the special Assistant Attorney General, Mr. Schweinhaut, believes that such methods are proper.

Mr. President, if you were arrested for spitting on the sidewalk and the F. B. I. had a warrant for your arrest for that great offense, the first thing they would do to you under this method of doing business would be to put you in handcuffs. They would take you to an office and strip you naked and search you. They would ask you all kinds of questions about your life, about your family relations. They would look up every step you had ever taken in our life, and confront you with every error you had ever made. Such a system of procedure cannot be permitted to live; if we are to have a free country, if we are to have a land such as we boast of, where human liberty is sacred, that kind of procedure must be outlawed and prohibited.

Mr. President, I will not read the remainder of Mr. Hartley's statement. I simply wish to say that he was mentioned particularly by Mr. Schweinhaut as having impressed him very favorably, as he did me when I had a talk with him.

Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD at this point, without reading, the statement made to Mr. Schweinhaut by Mrs. Catherine Hartley, the wife of the man to whom I have just been referring.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Question. Will you tell me, please, Mrs. Hartley, what occurred on the morning of February 6?

Answer. As I remember, we were awakened at 5 o'clock in the morning. I know I looked at the clock. I thought it was still the middle of the night. My husband went to the door. We could hear several voices. We asked who it was. They said F. B. I. We didn't believe this, because we didn't expect any visits from the F. B. I. We thought it must be an antilabor gang. I said, "If you are really F. B. I. men, call back later. My husband doesn't leave the house until 8:30, and I will be here later than that." With that, my husband said something to them to the effect that he also worked for the Government, and that he was easily available. That he didn't start to work until 8:30. With that, and shortly after these words were passed back and forth, they broke down the door. It had a regular burglar lock, but the whole thing came down in about 2 minutes. With that, several men rushed in. Someone went to the back door and let in two more in the back door. Handcuffs were immediately placed on my husband. He was pushed into a chair. They demanded that he get dressed, so he asked me to get his clothes from the bedroom. Two of the F. B. I. men went in with me. I tried to find his clothes to bring to him. They took one handcuff off so he could put his coat on. Three or four men stood around while he was getting dressed. I asked to see the warrant for his arrest, and they said it wasn't necessary to show it to me. We asked what the charges were, what it was all about. They said "you'll find out later." They refused to tell me. With that they took him down to the car. Two men remained in the house. One man was Frank Smith. I learned that when he talked over the telephone. I asked if they had a search warrant, this Frank Smith seemed to be chief man, and he said it wasn't necessary in this kind of a case. I asked that they identify themselves and asked for their names, but they refused to tell their names. They said it wasn't necessary for F. B. I. agents to give their names. I asked to see their badges. I thought there would be a number or something on the badge, but there is no number or any way of telling if they really are F. B. I. men.

Question. Did they show you a badge?

Answer. A plain badge. I guess it said F. B. I., but no number.

Question. Did they show you any identification card similar to this? (Showing her a card.)

Answer. No; I asked for it, in fact. But they refused. In the meantime, I asked to call a lawyer. There was a telephone in the house. I was restrained from calling a lawyer.

Question. What resistance did you give?

Answer. I didn't attempt to resist them at all. I asked. They refused. I probably started toward the phone. They took hold of my arms. I didn't struggle with them at all. I also asked if I could leave the house. I wanted to come down and see what had happened. They said I couldn't leave, I had to stay as long as they were there. They stayed to search the house. They searched the whole house. I didn't know what they were looking for. I had a filing cabinet there of material I had collected for about 5 years. They went all through that. It was International Labor Defense material, and Women's Auxiliary bulletins. They went through all of that very carefully, and also examined all photographs very carefully. After they had looked through all that, Mr. Smith went to the bedroom and went through all the drawers, and even went through my purse. They read all of our personal letters. I still kept on demanding to use the telephone, but I wasn't allowed to use it. Some time during this time our telephone rang. Mr. Smith answered it, and it was a call from the F. B. I. My husband had asked them to call, and at that time he stated who he was. I was with him all the time. I know what he did, because he kept me close to him. Every time I moved he followed me around the room.

Question. Did they examine the mattress, bedding, that sort of thing?

Answer. No.

Question. Did anyone else live in the house?

Answer. There was another couple living with us.

Question. Were they awakened?

Answer. Yes. And they were questioned, and their room was examined.

Question. What is their name?

Answer. Johnson.

They asked me my name. Where my husband worked, and how long we had been married. Where we had lived, etc. They asked me quite a few questions, which I answered. They were there from 2 to 2½ hours. I don't think they took very much with them when they left.

Question. Did they return everything so far as you know?

Answer. So far as I know. There was a question in my mind whether they had taken some photographs. The one man I didn't know what he was doing. I couldn't keep track of what he did.

Question. Did they treat you courteously at all times?

Answer. At times. At times they were very tough.

Question. How do you mean, tough?

Answer. In answering or asking questions.

Question. Were you courteous to them at all times?

Answer. I didn't struggle with them or anything. I demanded throughout to use the telephone. I tried to find out what the charges were. They wouldn't tell me and they didn't permit me to use the telephone. I immediately called Mr. Goodman when they left. I came down here to the office upstairs and asked to see my husband and a girl called on the phone into the next room. She then stated that I could not see him. I asked what the charges were and what this was all about. She said she wasn't able to give me any information. I went to Mr. Goodman's office and found out from him that the arraignment was set for 3 o'clock in the afternoon. I came back here about 2:30 and waited outside the courtroom. I was waiting outside the courtroom when I saw them come down all chained together.

Question. You saw them come out of the elevator?

Answer. I saw them come around the corner.

Question. Did you see them before they went into this little ante room to talk to the lawyer?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Were they chained together then?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Were they all on one chain?

Answer. I know a number of them were chained together, I can't tell how many. The whole group seemed to be chained together.

Question. Did you recognize any of them?

Answer. Mr. Schware, and Mr. Feldt I had seen before.

Question. Robert Taylor?

Answer. No.

Question. Did you go out to Milan on Saturday?

Answer. Yes.

I was in the courtroom, and I would like to say in regard to the $20,000 bail, that certainly in the case of my husband, he would not have been hard to locate. We had different charge accounts, and we received W. P. A. checks at that address.

Question. Did you hear anyone in the courtroom say that your husband had been hard to locate?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Who was it?

Answer. I don't know who it was.

Mr. Goodman asked that the bail be lowered. He asked in every case. But the man asked that this bail be set.

Question. Was the statement to the judge about the bail that the defendants might escape and be hard to find, or that they had been hard to find?

Answer. Both.

Question. You are certain about that?

Answer. Yes; I am certain.

I came up to the marshal's office and asked to see my husband, and they told me I couldn't see him. The man said, "You saw him last night; what do you want to see him again today for?" I asked where he would go from there. They said they were taking him to Milan. I demanded to see him. I got to see him for about 10 minutes. I inquired right away when I could see him at Milan. They told me Saturday. They told me he could write letters and receive letters. I didn't receive any. Mr. Goodman went out Friday. He said letters were allowed to go out from then on, and we would be able to see them on Saturday. He also told me they had been supposed to fill out blanks that were not necessary to fill out. Saturday we were told by the guard that we could not see them. Mrs. Feldt was allowed to see her son, but the other wives were not allowed to see their husbands.

Question. What reason did they give you?

Answer. The guard said it was the warden's instructions. He said Harold had refused to write my name down, etc. I demanded to see the warden, and finally, after 3 hours, the warden came. He told us that it would be impossible for us to see them—that they had not filled out the forms which gave the names of those who could visit them.

Question. Did you and the other women make any disturbance?

Answer. Just waited; that's all. The guard said, "If you want to wait, you can." We said, "We're going to wait until we find out." We waited until 8 o'clock at night.

Question. What time did you get out there?

Answer. We got there at 2 o'clock.

Question. Did you just leave?

Answer. The warden came in and told us that he was getting in touch with Mr. Bennett, and we would be able to see them the next Monday.

Question. You then went home?

Answer. Yes. We went out Sunday and saw them.

Question. Do you now feel that this episode at Milan was the result of a deliberate attempt to harass you, or a misunderstanding?

Answer. I don't think it was a misunderstanding. Up until Friday everything was all right. Something happened between Friday and Saturday which changed the situation.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. President, I wish to read the testimony of Dr. Sharfarman, a practicing physician, who was one of the defendants:

Please identify yourself, Dr. Shafarman—

Mr. Schweinhaut said:

A. I am a physician licensed to practice under the laws of the State of Michigan, and a graduate of the University of Michigan College of Medicine, and of the College of Letters and Science of the University of Wisconsin.

I am a member of the local, State, and National American Medical Association, and have been practicing in Detroit since September 1936. I was born in New York City, December 1, 1904, and attended primary and secondary schools there. I went to the University of Wisconsin for 5 years, from 1926 to 1931, and the University of Michigan from 1931 to 1933. Then I was an interne at Receiving Hospital in Detroit from 1933 to 1934. I have been married since 1925 and now reside at 211 Frederick Street in the city of Detroit, and have an office at 5320 John R Street.

Q. You studied abroad; did you not?

A. I spent the summer in 1934 studying at the Cancer Research Institute in Moscow.

Q. Did you do work in connection with Civilian Conservation camps?

A. I was on active duty in connection with Civilian Conservation camps for 22 months.

Q. What organization are you a member of?

A. I am a member of Phi Eta Sigma, Phi Beta Kappa, Wayne County Medical Society, Michigan State Medical Association, and American Medical Association.

Q. Are you a member of the Communist Party?

A. Of course not.

That is the kind of man this doctor appears to be. I submit, and it is undisputed, that he presents, to start with, facts which demonstrate that he ought at least to be treated like a human being by the F. B. I. or any other organization of government.

He was further asked:

Q. Have you any criminal record?

A. No.

Q. Do you spend most of your time in Detroit?

A. I have been in town since September 1936, with the exception of about 6 weeks in the summer of 1939, when I took a vacation in the Southwest. Two or three times a year we spend a week end in Chicago, and about once or twice a year I go to New York for a few days. My office has been at the address I gave since the 1st of October 1936. I have been in practice continuously. My name is in the Detroit telephone book and has been for 7 years.

Q. I suppose your first contact with this situation was on the morning you were arrested, was it not?

A. My first contact with the Federal Bureau of Investigation was at about 20 minutes after 4 on Tuesday morning, the 6th of February. My wife and I had been asleep, of course. The doorbell rang and kept right on ringing until somebody woke up. My wife woke first and answered the doorbell, then awakened me. I have a habit of many years standing to glance at the clock when I am awakened, and it was about 4:20, as I remember. I do that because frequently it is important to know when you got the call and how long it took you to get there in case the person at the other end is grieved by any delay. My wife came back and told me a man had called up from below.

It must be remembered that they lived in an apartment house. The statement that "a man had called up from below" means that they were on the third floor, as the witness says later on. Someone below, in the front of the apartment house, had telephoned.

My wife came back and told me a man had called up from below, gave his name as Mr. Johnson, and said he had a patient who had been seriously injured, and would I see him. I said of course I would see him, and if the man was badly hurt have him wait below; but if he could come up, let him come.

Q. Do you live in an apartment?

A. I live in a building which has a main floor and two floors above. I am on the top floor.

Q. Did your wife speak to the man through a speaking tube?

A. Yes.

Mr. President, let us see what was occurring in that apartment. Here was a doctor, a graduate of at least two universities of standing, who had gone abroad to study, who had taken post-graduate courses, who had served in well-recognized hospitals, who had no criminal record, who was practicing his profession; and at this time somebody called up from below and said his name was Johnson, and that he had with him a badly injured man, and asked whether the doctor would see him. Of course, that was part of the doctor's business. He tells, later on in his testimony, that he had been up almost all that night and the preceding night; he had had very little sleep; and, of course, he told the man to come up. Mark you, the doctor did not ask the man how much money he had, or if he could pay his bill. All the doctor knew was that an injured man was said to be below; and he said, "Bring him up, and I will do the best I can with him." The man talking said his name was Johnson.

The truth is, there was not any such man. There was no injured man there. It was all a deception. It was all false; and, although Mr. Sweinhaut does not mention it in his report, personally he told me that that charge was absolutely true. He thinks the F. B. I. were justified in using means of that kind and practicing that kind of a deception to get into the man's private home.

Personally, I do not believe it. Especially in dealing with a man of this doctor's standing, when there is no charge against him of anything malicious or bad, personally I do not believe any such method should be resorted to, or that it is justifiable under any circumstances in a case of that kind. I think it is not only reprehensible but disgraceful and illegal. I believe that any respectable organization which wanted to do what was right would not resort to methods of that kind to get an innocent man into their custody, and handcuff him.

I awakened gradually and by that time my wife came back again and said there were two men at the door, neither one of whom appeared to be in any need of medical services, and she didn't like the way they were acting. They were acting in an unusual manner. I couldn't remember anybody by the name of Johnson who was a patient of mine, so I got up and slipped on my bathrobe and came out of my bedroom to see these men, who had come up the stairs. The first one to whom I spoke seemed to be very impatient to see me. He had been telling my wife he wanted to see the doctor right away and when I saw him and he saw me, I asked him what he wanted. He said, "I have a warrant for your arrest." Standing there with nothing on except pajamas and a bathrobe, and entertaining the very unusual idea of being arrested at 4:20 in the morning, I said "Won't you sit down for a moment and let me get this idea straight?" I sat down in a chair in the room, but the gentlemen remained standing and, as I gradually awakened and things began to dawn on me, it appeared to me that these two men seriously intended to take me with them.

Question. Were there only two men?

Answer. There were only two men. Those were the two men I saw at first. Then this short man in the blue coat told the other one to go down and get the rest of the boys. The other man did that and then the same short man told my wife to wake up everybody in the house. My wife by that time was becoming somewhat apprehensive and insisted on knowing who these men were. They said they were agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Question. Is that the first time they had so identified themselves?

Answer. Yes. They had purposely, in order to get in I suppose, stated they had a man who was injured. As I said, this short fellow identified himself and said he was an F. B. I agent. He ordered my wife to wake up everyone in the house. When she asked him why he said, "We are going to search the place." I asked him if he had a warrant and he said "We don't need a warrant." He insisted that I stay exactly where I was, that I not move out of the chair. He refused to permit us to use a telephone to either identify him or to consult an attorney. These men persistently refused to indicate where they were taking me or why. I asked them to show me the warrant for my arrest and he held a piece of paper up before me, but I didn't get much of a chance to look at it. I asked him what the charge was and he mentioned some numbers of some code or section of the law. I don't remember the numbers, but he said I was charged with having violated a certain law. The only clew I was given as to what the charge was was the mention of a series of numbers, which I don't remember. By that time the other three or four men had returned—that is, one man had gone down and brought three more up, making five altogether.

Question. Could you be mistaken about that and there were only four men?

Answer. I might be mistaken about that. My conversation was with the little fellow in a blue coat, with his hat pulled down over his eyes, who seemed to be in charge and giving orders. I remember two other men, one whose name I later heard was Lally. He is a somewhat slimmer and younger man. I distinctly remember him and I distinctly remember the slightly baldheaded fellow with glasses, wearing a brown suit, whose name was Meekins.

Question. Wait, let me give you the names of the four men who were there: Meekins, Lally, O'Hair, and Weigle.

Answer. O'Hair must have been the short fellow who was in charge. Meekins was the tall chap with glasses, who later asked me if I had ever seen him before. I didn't remember him and he related to me that he had once been to my office inquiring concerning some woman who may have received medical attention at an office in that neighborhood. He said that happened about 2 years ago. This phase of our contact took place later in the morning, at about 10 a. m. O'Hair was the baldheaded short man, with the blue coat, who held the paper in his hand and gave all the orders. These men insisted that everybody in the apartment come out to the living room, so that they could search the apartment.

Question. Who was in the apartment with you?

Answer. My wife, and her sister and husband (Mr. and Mrs. Singer), who live with us. There is also a young man, a roomer, by the name of Hockman.

Question. Do you have any children?

Answer. No. This man, who said he was an agent of the F. B. I., insisted on having everyone in the living room, so the other gentlemen could go through the apartment. The situation was an unusual one from several points of view. In the past, on at least two occasions, my telephone has rung and I have been requested, for some reason or other, to leave town. The reasons were never given to me. This happened a year and four months ago, when I was threatened by somebody who used the phone to convey the threat. Also, since the Dies Committee arrived in town there has been a certain amount of publicity and comment in the newspapers concerning me, so that from time to time we have thought that somebody might come up sometime to take me for a ride, and I think that was what frightened my wife that morning. She thought these men were just a gang of hoodlums who had come under a ruse to get me out of the appartment and take me places.

Question. What kind of publicity was there concerning you?

Answer. In September 1938 the Dies committee came to town and conducted a series of hearings. All of the attendant publicity can be seen in the files of the local newspapers. It had to do with Murphy's campaign for reelection and his actions as Governor during the wave of sit-down strikes, and with some other political problems.

Question. How did you figure in the publicity?

Answer. It was alleged that I had misinterpreted the rules laid down by the local board of health for the conduct of the local tuberculosis case-finding campaign, and it was further alleged that I had given physical examinations to men who were to go to Spain on behalf of the Loyalist Government. These things were all publicized through the Dies committee investigation here, and are a matter of record in the published reports of the Dies committee and in the newspapers. At that time, as I say, some fanatic or some other person called twice and threatened me—told me to leave town or else.

Question. You thought this arrest had to do with that situation?

Answer. We thought this might be one of those things.

Question. Did any of these agents exhibit to you their badges or credentials?

Answer. As I remember, none of them exhibited their badges to me. I believe one of them exhibited his badge to my wife—O'Hair, I believe.

Question. Did anyone show you anything like that? (Exhibiting identification card.)

Answer. No; not to me.

To get back to the thread of the story, when the five of us were assembled in that living room, the short man who appeared to be in charge told me he wanted me to get dressed and wear the same clothes I had worn the day before, as he wanted me to go along with him. During that time my wife had been asking these men why we were not permitted to use a phone to consult a lawyer or to confirm their statement that they were F. B. I. agents. It was positively a weird situation, being awakened at 4:20 in the morning by Government agents. We had never heard of such a thing in this country. The whole procedure seemed very unusual, and at no time was I sure these men were bona fide agents. I felt they had come to get me, for the reasons given you, and the best thing was for me to go along quietly and give them no excuse for raising hell around the house. I didn't know how many there were. I didn't know how many there were downstairs, and I thought for the safety of the rest of the family, if I did everything they told me to do and I went along with them quietly, there would be no excuse given them for any use of force. They appeared to be not unwilling to use whatever force might be necessary.

Question. What indicated that to you?

Answer. Just their general appearance, their demeanor and attitude, and brusqueness—their general manner of handling the situation. It is just an impression I got. Nobody said to me, "If you don't come we are going to take you." It appeared to me these men were there for the purpose of taking me with them and they were going to take me whether I liked it or not. I thought the best thing to do was go with them. They would not permit my wife or me or anyone else to get near a phone. All of us were kept together in the front room where we couldn't move, for reasons I have never been able to figure out. When that agent O'Hair asked me to get dressed he specifically stated I was to wear the same clothes I wore the day before. I was instructed to go and get dressed and this man O'Hair stayed about 3 feet away from me at all times, at no time more than that. I was permitted to go to my bedroom, get into some underwear, and permitted to shave, and then I was escorted to another room where I keep my clothing, and I was told to take the clothes I wore the day before. While I was getting dressed I looked over my shoulder and saw the man whose name is Lally going through the drawers of my desk in my study. I got dressed, and one of the agents—I think Meekins—felt my clothes and went over me—fanned me, I think they call it—to see if I had a weapon on me. Then Meekins and O'Hair took me out of the apartment, leaving behind Lally going through my desk. At that time I was not handcuffed. We got outside the door to the apartment into the hall before——

Question. How many rooms are there in your apartment?

Answer. Eight rooms and a couple of bathrooms.

Question. Do you know of your own knowledge that the agents searched each of these rooms?

Answer. Of my own knowledge I do not. The only phase of searching the apartment I witnessed was the glance I got of Mr. Lally going through the drawers of my desk at the time I was getting dressed.

Question. You had gotten out into the hall——

Answer. We got out into the hall and up to that time nobody in the apartment was permitted to make a phone call or to confirm with police whether F. B. I. agents were actually picking anyone up. We weren't permitted to communicate with any friends or legal advisers. We weren't told what the nature of the charges were except, as I indicated, a number of numbers were mentioned, and up to that time I personally was not satisfied these men were bona fide Government agents. I had the distinct impression I was going to be taken for a ride and the thing for me to do was to give them no excuse to start a roughhouse at the apartment. I think that was what worried my wife. She wasn't sure they were F. B. I. agents. When we got out into the hall, leaving the apartment, O'Hair produced a pair of handcuffs and told me he was going to handcuff me. I suggested to him that I had every intention of going along quietly and I didn't see the necessity of handcuffs. He said that was a rule and he was going to handcuff me and there didn't seem to be any doubt about his intentions, so he handcuffed my two hands together. Then they took me down below, two flights, to a parked Chevrolet coupe, one of the new models with the compartment behind the front seat, and I was placed in the rear compartment handcuffed. They proceeded to drive.

Question. You were not handcuffed to an agent?

Answer. No; the agents apparently intended to keep their hands loose. I still had no idea where they were taking me and they were uncommunicative. They had told Hockman in the apartment. They wouldn't tell my wife. Incidentally, a very significant element in the procedure was the refusal of these alleged agents at that moment to permit me to talk to my wife or her to talk to me. They insisted on keeping me separate from all the others and refused to permit any conversation at all. They did permit me to kiss my wife good-bye. Some queer ideas ran through my head at that moment. I have heard of men being taken for a ride. In fact, there was one incident on the west coast recently where the wife of some man was murdered. We got into this Chevrolet car and proceeded to drive west toward Woodward, and then toward Cass. By the time we got to Vernor Highway they indicated we were on our way to the Federal Building. When we arrived there it was sometime after 5 o'clock. I was taken into a room on this floor, if I remember correctly.

Question. Do you recall seeing on the door of the room "Federal Bureau of Investigation"?

Answer. As a matter of fact I can't remember that detail.

Question. Actually their office is right over this one, it being on the ninth floor. The layout of the rooms is something like this. Do you have in mind that it was as high as the eighth floor?

Answer. It was plenty high. We could see the river from the windows.

(This statement is being taken in the office of the United States attorney on the eighth floor of the Federal Building in Detroit. The offices of the F. B. I. are on the ninth floor, immediately over this office, and the arrangement of the rooms is practically the same. In each office a view of the river may be had.)

On my arrival I saw a doctor in the hallway about to enter another door, recognized him and hailed him.

Question. Who was it?

Answer. Dr. Lang, a local plastic surgeon who was an interne at Receiving Hospital at the same time I was.

Question. Did this occur on the floor to which you were taken?

Answer. Yes. I saw this doctor carrying his bag, recognized him, and greeted him. A few minutes later I was taken into one of the offices (an open office), taken behind some filing cases, and told to undress, which I did, and I was then examined by this same physician, Dr. Lang. He looked me over, checked my blood pressure, took my pulse, and looked for scars, and then I was permitted to dress again and asked to sit down at a desk opposite to Mr. O'Hair and Mr. Meekins, who from that point on questioned me for a number of hours.

Question. Was there anyone else in this room other than yourself and the agents?

Answer. There were other people in the room, most of whom I believe were agents. One or two of the other people in the room, it appeared later, had also been arrested and brought down to the office.

Question. But at that time you didn't recognize them as the individuals who had been arrested?

Answer. That is right. That transpired later. Some time after I arrived this young woman, Mary Paige, came through on her way from one room to another and later I recognized Dr. Rosfeld passing through. I was sitting at a desk opposite these two agents, who proceeded to question me, and the questioning went on for hours and hours. I lost track of time except at one stage of the questioning period it was suggested breakfast be sent for.

Question. Who suggested that?

Answer. One of the agents. It must have been around 8 o'clock. Incidentally I had expressed a desire for some coffee when I first got to the Federal Building, and one of the agents was kind enough to send for some coffee and two or three of us had some.

Question. Do you know which of the agents sent for the coffee?

Answer. I think it was Meekins. That brings us to 8 o'clock in the morning with questioning going on. The questions continued for another couple of hours. I didn't have a watch and didn't know what time it was. We had lunch somewhere along about 12:30. The questioning had ceased, I think, shortly before time was taken out for lunch.

Question. Were you asked what you wanted for breakfast, and did you get it?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Was that also true of luncheon?

Answer. I got a darn good lunch. It was perfectly satisfactory. They probably couldn't get the steak I ordered, but hash is good if it is well cooked.

Question. At what time did you have luncheon?

Answer. At about 12:30. I was further permitted to contact my office and leave some instructions concerning patients who had appointments and whose problems required professional attention. I was permitted to use the phone on a gentleman's agreement that I would stick to professional problems concerning patients and not depart from this. I did not know if my wife knew where I was. I was not permitted to call home. I was denied that definitely. I was not permitted to tell anyone over the phone where I was, which didn't make me any too happy.

Question. Did you ask for permission to call your lawyer?

Answer. Of course.

Question. Approximately when?

Answer. When I got here. We had asked at the house when we would be permitted to consult a lawyer. When I got here I was permitted to use the phone after my office opened. I was permitted to use the phone on condition I did not state where I was or with whom I was. I told the office girl I was out on an emergency call and wouldn't be back for the rest of the day, and gave her some instructions concerning disposition of cases.

Question. Did you ask for a lawyer?

Answer. I asked Meekins and O'Hair and they said, "No; you cannot communicate with your lawyer, your wife, or anyone else." The only one I was permitted to talk to was my office girl. The only things I was permitted to talk about were those things which related to my practice. The boys were standing close enough to me to take me off the air if I departed from that agreement.

Question. Now you were at lunch time.

Answer. The questioning had gone on from the time I arrived in the morning, with an interruption for breakfast. The questioning faded off shortly before we had lunch. The only way I knew what time it was was the interruption for lunch. One of the other agents—I am sure he was not one of those who came to my apartment—had a newspaper and I asked him to let me see it. He wouldn't let me see it. Later I learned the newspapers had been splashed with tremendous headlines. That was probably the reason I couldn't see it.

Question. Did the questioning continue after lunch?

Answer. No; not in an organized manner. This man Lally approached me, either shortly before or shortly after lunch, and suggested to me that the F. B. I. never arrested anyone unless it had an airtight case; that the record of convictions was somewhere in the neighborhood of 99 percent.

Mr. President, it is said that third-degree methods were not used. The methods which were used are not disputed. It is believed by Mr. Schweinhaut that the methods used are justifiable, that they are in common use by the F. B. I., and that it is proper that they should be used. I submit that this is an instance which shows how improper the methods are. Even when no physical force is applied, an educated man, as this defendant was, could see clearly just what the agents were driving at. He was given to understand, "The F. B. I. has got you. It never gets anybody unless it has an airtight case, so you had better look out." The idea they wanted to convey to the prisoner was that, "The F. B. I. will get you if you don't look out. The F. B. I. never makes any mistakes. It is perfect. When it gets a man he is done for." If it is permitted to use such methods defendants will be done for, as the men in this case were practically done for.

What must have been the attitude of that educated doctor after that abuse from 4 or 5 o'clock in the morning until 3 o'clock in the afternoon? What must have been his thoughts? How much admiration for our country did the F. B. I. organization inspire in its prisoners? How are love and patriotic enthusiasm for the flag inspired by men who wear the flag about them and wave it at all times, saying, "We are perfect; we are the F. B. I. We never arrest anybody unless we have an airtight case, so you had better look out." Even if they do not say "You had better look out," they know that the prisoners will look out. Such methods are intended to excite defendants, make them nervous, and break them down. When a man is not permitted to kiss his wife good-bye, or if he is permitted to do so, and he thinks at the time—as this man did—that he is probably seeing his wife for the last time, what must his feelings be? He did not then believe that he was in the hands of F. B. I. men, but in the hands of crooks who were about to take him "for a ride." How much did Mr. Feldt's family admire the Government organization when it took that boy away from his home at 5 o'clock in the morning, with his mother, his father, his two sisters, and his brothers there to watch it all? How much higher did the Government of the United States rise in the minds of those people when they saw what was being done, when they were brushed aside, and their house was searched without any warrant and without any cause?

All this goes to show that the impression the F. B. I. agents want to make upon prisoners is, "We have an airtight case against you. We never make a mistake; and you had better look out. We have got you now, and there is no escape." Some of the prisoners were told that it would be better for them to confess and tell everything they knew. They claimed they knew nothing and had nothing to tell. Some of them were asked about all the other prisoners and some were not. "The F. B. I.," said this agent, "never arrested anyone unless it had an airtight case."

I continue to read:

Question. When was all this?

Answer. After the formal questioning had ceased and Lally had relieved one of the agents who was watching me. During the entire procedure the agents were standing by and watching us. Maybe they thought somebody would jump out of a window, I don't know. Lally had seated himself near me after the questioning was concluded and struck up a conversation with me. All morning I had been trying to find out what the charges were and would be answered by someone answering a few numbers, and that was the charge. As a matter of fact we never did find out what the charges were until a couple of days later. Even when we were taken into court and asked to plead, we had no knowledge of the charges, only numbers. As I say, I was trying to find out what the charges were and Lally indicated this charge, which he interpreted into conspiracy to violate a law (without stating what law), was sure to be proved; that the record of the F. B. I. was nearly 100 percent. He was absolutely certain we would be convicted. Lally reiterated his certainty that we would be convicted of this charge and that the conviction carried a long term in jail and a sizable fine, and he suggested that I could do myself a lot of good if I would just tell these boys what they wanted to know. It seemed to me he was suggesting something to me that popularly is known as "turning State's evidence." He was asking me to help myself by confessing to this charge, so to speak, and he was sure that if I did that due consideration would be given to my having done so, when and if sentence was pronounced.

Question. Was all of this more or less casual after lunch?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Let's go back, please, to the morning. What were the type and nature of the questions that were asked you?

Answer. At the outset my identity was established—that is, I was asked where I was born, who my parents were and where they were born, who my brother and sisters are, where I had gone to school, what I had done in the intervals between going to school, how long I had been married and to whom, questions about my wife and her family. Then the questioning converged on the problem at hand apparently, and I was asked whether I knew certain individuals (many names were mentioned), whether I had given medical service to certain individuals, what the political affiliations of certain people were, whether I was a member of this or that party, whether I knew certain individuals who had testified before the Dies committee, what I had done for these individuals or done to them, and a multitude of questions along that line. While I was answering the questions notes were being made of yellow paper of that type, with pencil, by the agents. Meekins continued the questioning when O'Hair left off late in the morning, and O'Hair dictated to a stenographer an abstract of the material which they had gathered as the questioning went along, and a stenographer drew up a four and one-half-page single-spaced typewritten statement which I was asked to read and check through, and sign. You realize, of course, that at that stage of the game I had had only 12 hours' sleep out of the preceding 72 hours. I had been out on night calls practicing medicine and hadn't been getting any sleep, and the morning they came to my apartment for me I had had only 2 hours of sleep. As a matter of fact, in the last 14 days I have had only 4 nights' sleep. They presented me with this four and one-half-page typewritten statement and asked me to read and sign it. I read it and couldn't quite recognize the material in it. It seems in the process of boiling it down and abstracting it and dictating it to the stenographer much of the important context of the statements I made had been omitted. I refused to sign it unless given an opportunity to get some sleep and to consult my legal adviser. My refusal to sign that paper, which Mr. Meekins said wasn't important, absolutely infuriated those boys. They just got mad, though they told me it didn't make any difference whether I signed it or not. I asked them if it didn't make any difference, why bother. They got madder than hornets. At least that is my interpretation of their behavior from that point on. They were extraordinarily unhappy and displeased.

Question. Did you refuse to answer any of the questions they asked you?

Answer. No.

Question. Was the questioning intermittent or constant?

Answer. It was persistent. There was practically no let-up in the questioning, it went on and on and on.

Question. Can you give an example of a statement you had made that had, in transition, become changed on paper?

Answer. I don't think I can do that off-hand. I could if I saw the typewritten document again. As I say, I was very tired and physically fatigued. They turned this thing over to me after perhaps half a dozen hours of questioning. It was difficult to read the thing and try to digest it and understand it.

Question. You said they asked you about a number of different people and asked if you were a member of this or that organization. Can you remember the names of any of the organizations?

Answer. They asked if I were a member of the Communist Party. Also the Civil Rights Federation. I can't remember the others.

Question. Was reference to those organizations and your answer concerning them in the written statement?

Answer. I don't remember.

Question. What transpired after lunch, other than Lally's questioning you?

Answer. Every so often I would inquire as to what the procedure was going to be, when we were going to be permitted to see a lawyer, when we were going to be taken to court, when we were going to have a chance to face our accusers, and when they were going to put an end to this situation of holding us incommunicado without any information given us as to what their plans were and, when I would ask such questions, I would be told just exactly nothing. They gave evasive answers and I was left to figure it out for myself. I had no idea how long they were going to keep me in that office. Whether this business of having our meals brought in and being questioned was going on for a day or a week.

Question. When were you first told you were to be arraigned?

Answer. I think it was indicated to us about 15 or 20 minutes before we were taken to court. I forgot to say we were again examined by the physician.

Question. When was that?

Answer. It is hard to fix these things as to time, but I think it was after the questioning but before lunch. The guards had been changed a couple of times.

Question. What do you mean, the guards?

Answer. The F. B. I. agents who apparently had the job of sitting there watching us.

Question. Were the four agents who arrested you with you throughout the morning?

Answer. At least one of them was there all the time—not all four.

Question. What happened after you were told you were to be taken into court at 3?

Answer. Everybody who was to be taken into court was told to get dressed up. We completed dressing and then we were taken by the respective agents into another part of this series of offices.

I remember at one stage of the game the questioning was interrupted long enough to fingerprint us and take our photographs, and one thing or another like that. It was just before I was questioned I think. When we got here we were given physical examinations, fingerprinted, and photographed with pretty numbers strung across us. We were assembled, so to speak, with our attending agents, in a larger room than the one we had been, in this direction from the office we originally had been in [pointing west]. Up to this time we had not been permitted to communicate with friends, relatives, lawyers, or anyone else. We were not told where we were to be taken. We were kept in the dark more or less. Then we were handcuffed and taken to the elevator and down to a room opposite the courtroom. To the best of my memory we were handcuffed to a chain, the whole string of us, before we left on our way to the courtroom.

At this point Mr. NORRIS yielded to Mr. PITTMAN and Mr. TOWNSEND to present certain newspaper articles which appear at the conclusion of the speech of Mr. NORRIS.

Mr. NORRIS. I resume reading from the testimony:

Question. Can you recall that any of the men who arrested you put on the handcuffs or chain in that assembly room?

Answer. This is a problem in psychology. I am trying to recall precise details. I am thinking back to a situation when I was very much fatigued and pretty thoroughly tired out, when I was concerned with the larger aspects of the problem and not so much with details, at a time when it wouldn't make a damned bit of difference to me if I were handcuffed to an agent or someone else, but, as I say, to the best of my knowledge Mr. Lally put a pair of handcuffs on me and then we went back to that room. He may have put the handcuffs on me after we went through the door. At that stage Lally apparently was taking charge. Shortly thereafter, when the entire group was being gotten ready to move out of the office and take an elevator downstairs, we were handcuffed to the chain. It must have been Lally who took the original handcuffs off so we could be hooked on to the chain. The original handcuffs were on both wrists. The second time the handcuffs were taken off one wrist and hooked to the chain. I don't think it is humanly possible to be absolutely certain of such details, and I don't care to try to imagine what might have happened. I am trying to remember what did happen. To the best of my knowledge we were hooked on that chain.

Question. Did the same agents go down to the courtroom with you?

Answer. They came right along. Lally made an irrevocable impression on me. There were two or three things about Lally that I will never forget. In the first place, I knew somebody by that name and I asked him if he had relatives by that name in a C. C. C. camp or some place. In the second place, he suggested to me that I act the role of an informer if I could and save myself a lot of trouble, which is a suggestion that I don't take very well. The third one is that my wife told me afterward that when he was going through my desk and papers and looking around that he seemed to be a little bit unhappy at having to do that. I will remember Lally after I have forgotten Meekins and O'Hair. There was one other thing. Lally suggested to me that I hold back when the photographers went into action and I probably could avoid having my picture taken so many times.

Question. You refer to newspaper photographers?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Did they take your picture?

Answer. Oh, yes; lots of pictures. They took our picture after we left the detention room and they took some more pictures when we came out. I was acting on Lally's suggestion when we came out, so I didn't get too many flashes.

Question. When did Lally tell you about hanging back?

Answer. I think he made the suggestion in the bureau room.

Question. Did the agents remain with you until you went into the courtroom?

Answer. When we went into the courtroom the agents were still with us and they were also in the jury room when Mr. Goodman came in.

Question. What happened after you got into the jury room?

Answer. We were pretty thoroughly jammed in there—7,543½ agents in there. You couldn't see anybody because the agents were so many. Mr. Goodman came in and told us in a few words that our wives had communicated with him and asked him to come down and appear as our lawyer. I signified that was acceptable to me. Mr. Goodman told us we would be asked to plead and when we were so asked we should simply stand mute. I asked Mr. Goodman what the charges were, but I don't think he answered at that time, so I didn't know. Dr. Rosfeld had his separate adviser, but the rest of us accepted Mr. Goodman's services. After talking to Mr. Goodman a few minutes, in the presence of our guards, we were taken across to the courtroom and seated.

Question. Were you still on the chain when you were led from the jury room to the courtroom?

Answer. As I remember we were.

Question. What happened in the courtroom?

Answer. We were seated at the desk near the judge's bench and, as I remember it, the F. B. I. agents stood along the wall just beyond the door through which we had come. Finally the judge appeared and we acknowledged his entrance and sat down again. I was called to appear before the judge four times and charges were read off by number (indictment numbers, I suppose) and we were asked to plead.

Question. Were you arraigned singly—that is, were you asked to plead singly?

Answer. Most of the time I was one of several individuals, either one other or two or six.

Question. Where were you taken after the arraignment?

Answer. After the arraignment when all the procedure in the courtroom was concluded we were hooked back on this chain and taken up in the elevator a floor or more into the marshal's office, at one end of which was a barred space, a cell, a tremendous cell. There were a couple of men in the cell and we were all taken in there, that is, all the males were taken in there.

Question. Did the agents still attend you?

Answer. They left us at the courtroom. That was the last I saw of them that day. In the marshal's office we were again fingerprinted and some more records made out, and by that time my attorney had succeeded in raising bail for me. It must have been 5 o'clock when we got out.

Question. Did the marshal interrogate you at all?

Answer. The only questioning in the marshal's office was simply for the purpose of identification—date of birth, weight, height, fingerprints, etc.

Question. That concludes the questioning, Dr. Shafarman.

Mr. President, I ask that there be printed the statement of Mr. Goodman, who was the attorney for the defendants in the Detroit case, or of all of them but one, at least.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMATHERS in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am an attorney practicing in the city of Detroit. I graduated from the Detroit College of Law in 1928 and have practiced ever since. I am admitted to practice in the Federal courts. I have been associated with, and acting as counsel for, the Michigan Civil Rights Federation for more than 1 year.

At about 6 o'clock a. m., February 6, 1940, I received a telephone call at my home from, I believe, Mrs. Peter Kowal. I am not certain that it was Mrs. Kowal, or whether it was Mrs. Clark. She told me that the F. B. I. had raided her home, arrested her husband, searched her place, and had just left. She wanted me to take care of the case. I told her to meet me at my office at 9. At 9 o'clock I appeared at my office and found Mrs. Kowal, Mrs. Clark, and Mrs. Hartley, all there. They each told me of F. B. I. arrests of their husbands. During the morning I received a call from the Civil Rights Federation, who had been notified of these arrests, and I was asked to intercede in the matter.

I telephoned Mr. Lehr, the district attorney. Mr. Lehr was not in his office and I spoke to Mr. Thornton, an assistant district attorney, who gave me some general information. I then came down to the office of the district attorney on the eighth floor of the Post Office Building, Detroit, and waited for Mr. Lehr. I asked Mr. Lehr for permission to see the prisoners. He told me that I would have to see Mr. John Bugas who was in charge of the case for the F. B. I.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Did you ask him what they were charged with?

Mr. GOODMAN. Yes. I asked Mr. Lehr the nature of the charges and he told me that there were a number of indictments returned by the grand jury and that these indictments were under the statute, the number of which he gave to me.

I asked him to see copies of the indictments and he told me that the indictments were secret and that I could not see them until the arraignment. I went upstairs to the ninth floor and waited for Mr. Bugas.

When he came into the office, he stepped out into the hall to discuss the matter with me. I told him that I had been retained as attorney for a number of the prisoners, or their wives, and also that I was representing the Civil Rights Federation. I asked him for permission to speak to the prisoners whom I represented. He told me that I could not see them. I told him that as a lawyer I always felt that I had a right to talk to my clients who were arrested, and I mentioned that this right was granted by the Constitution. He replied very curtly to the effect that I could not see the prisoners until they were arraigned. He then became somewhat annoyed, or angry, and told me that I was foisting myself on the case because the prisoners had not asked for me. I told him that as a practicing attorney it was my experience that people who were arrested were not usually the ones to ask for an attorney, but rather the friends or relatives who would retain an attorney to protect their interests. He still refused me permission to see them, and again mentioned that I was foisting myself on the case. I suggested to him that it would be almost impossible for me to represent my clients at the arraignment and plead properly for them before I had had an opportunity to talk to them and to find out what they had to say, so that I would know how to plead. After some discussion, he finally stated that he would let me see my clients for 5 minutes before the arraignment, which was scheduled for 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

I suggested to him that 5 minutes was not a very long time within which to discuss the case adequately with my clients and to represent them properly at the arraignment. He stated that he did not care to discuss the matter any further, and I could see my clients at 3 o'clock.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Fix the time of day as nearly as you can.

Mr. GOODMAN. This conversation with Mr. Bugas took place some time before noon, probably about 11 o'clock. I have no exact remembrance of the time.

Later in the day, approximately 1 o'clock, I had another conversation with Mr. Lehr, at which time I discussed the question of the bonds for the defendants with him. He told me that he would recommend a bond of $20,000 for each of the defendants except for the two doctors, for whom he would recommend bond of $2,500. I told Mr. Lehr that I thought that bond far too high in view of the fact that most of these defendants were workers and had no money and could not raise such a large bond, and from what little I knew of these defendants that they would not attempt to evade trial. He stated that he would, nevertheless, ask for these amounts. I told him that Mr. Bugas had refused me the right to see the defendants, and that I was told I could only see them for 5 minutes before the arraignment.

I appeared at Judge Moinet's courtroom at approximately 2:45. At about 5 minutes to 3 I saw the defendants being led down the corridor toward the courtroom handcuffed to a chain. I was told to go to the jury room near the courtroom where I would be permitted to see the prisoners. The prisoners were then led into the jury room still manacled to the chain. The prisoners and myself were surrounded by men whom I believed to be F. B. I. agents. While surrounded by them, and with the doors to the jury room open, with curious onlookers staring into the room from the doors, and listening to what was being said, I attempted to discuss the case with my clients. I first mentioned to them the fact that Mr. Bugas had told me I did not represent them, and I asked them whether they wanted me to represent them or not. I told them that their wives and the Civil Rights Federation had asked me to assist them in the matter. They all agreed that I should represent them at the arraignment except Dr. Rosefield, who was represented by A. Joseph Seltzer. Mr. Seltzer was also present in the room. In view of the fact that I could not talk with my clients without being overheard by the men whom I thought were F. B. I. agents, as well as the other people who were around the room, I was unable to discuss the case with them, or to ask them more than a few formal questions, and to tell them that the only reason I had not seen them before was that I had not been permitted to do so.

Mary Paige was also in the jury room with the other prisoners, although I do not believe she was handcuffed to the chain.

After a few minutes of this type of interview with my clients, I told the men in charge of the prisoners that I was through questioning them, and they were then led into the courtroom where the chain was taken off, as well as the handcuffs. They were then seated in a corner of the room near the judge's bench, and a person was placed immediately in front of them to guard them. Shortly afterwards Judge Moinet took the bench, and all of the defendants were brought forward to be arraigned.

While the District Attorney was reading the general nature of the charge and asking for a $20,000 bond, I attempted to discuss with the defendants while standing before the judge, those facts in their lives which would suggest a smaller bond to the judge, such as age, whether married or not, whether working, whether they had ever been arrested or convicted, and so forth. The little information I was able to obtain in this way, I presented to the judge as an argument to reduce the bond. The District Attorney recommended $20,000 bond in each case with the exception, I believe, of Mary Paige for whom he recommended a $10,000 bond, and for the doctors, a bond of $2,500 each. Judge Moinet set bond of $20,000 each for five of the prisoners, $10,000 for four of the prisoners, and $2,500 each for doctors. It was almost impossible for me to argue adequately to the judge for a reduction of the bonds because of the very sketchy and inadequate information I had obtained in the few minutes I talked with the prisoners.

After all of the defendants had been arraigned under all of the indictments, I told the judge I had not been permitted to see the defendants, and asked that I be granted permission to do so. He stated that it was his understanding that an attorney had a right to see his clients, and that he was certain I would be given that right. Immediately after the arraignments, the defendants were handcuffed to the chain and led away to the marshal's office.

I appeared at the marshal's office with Mrs. Hartley, who was the only wife of any of the defendants who was in court. The defendants were being fingerprinted and questioned by the marshal, and those who were not being questioned were in the cell in the marshal's office. I asked for permission to see the prisoners, and Marshal Barc at first refused to let me see them. After some argument and discussion, he finally consented to let me speak to them in the cell. He locked me in the cell with the prisoners and there, for the first time, I was able to sit down and talk with my clients.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Was any deputy present while you talked to them in the cell?

Mr. GOODMAN. There were some other prisoners in the cell, but no Government official, so far as I know.

At this time I was still unaware of the exact charges against the defendants, not having been given copies of the indictments. I did not receive copies of the indictments until the following day, when they were mimeographed by the district attorney's office. I talked with my clients for about 20 minutes, when they were again lined up by the marshal, handcuffed to the chain, and taken out to Milan prison. The two doctors were able to supply their bonds and were released that same afternoon.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. How long did you talk with the prisoners in the marshal's cell?

Mr. GOODMAN. I believe about 20 minutes.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Did you consider that time enough for your purpose then?

Mr. GOODMAN. Yes; there was nothing much I could do at that time.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. You did not protest to the marshal that you were not given enough time then?

Mr. GOODMAN. No.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Were the indictments read when the defendants were arraigned?

Mr. GOODMAN. No; just the titles.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Were you asked to waive the reading of the indictments?

Mr. GOODMAN. Yes.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. And you did?

Mr. GOODMAN. Yes.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Were they arraigned singly or in a group?

Mr. GOODMAN. On the conspiracy indictment they were each arraigned separately. After that they were arraigned in groups as they were named in that indictment.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. You said that the marshal questioned them also. What type of questions did the marshal ask them?

Mr. GOODMAN. I don't know. I didn't hear the questions. I just knew that they were being questioned.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. You pleaded not guilty?

Mr. GOODMAN. We stood mute for all defendants, as did Mr. Seltzer for his clients.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Are you familiar enough with criminal practice in the Federal courts to say whether or not those bonds were average, or high, or do you know?

Mr. GOODMAN. I myself have had no experience in criminal practice in the Federal court. I inquired after the bonds were set and found from the opinion of other attorneys that they were high.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. By that you mean higher than usual?

Mr. GOODMAN. Higher than what they would expect in an indictment of this character. On the conspiracy, the sentence can be 2 years and a $10,000 fine. The bond set was twice the amount they could have been fined if found guilty.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Under title 2, the sentence could be 7 years, couldn't it? And a fine?

Mr. GOODMAN. That's the enlistments. Yes.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. And, of course, there were the other indictments. There were personal recognizance bonds set on the substantive indictments?

Mr. GOODMAN. Yes.

The following day I went to the Wayne County jail to see Mary Paige. I found that she was being kept in solitary confinement; that is, she wasn't kept in a cell leading into a corridor with other cells so that she would have contact with other prisoners, as was true of the other prisoners there. She was kept in a cell where she could not see nor talk to any other prisoner, but only to the person who brought her meals and myself, when I was able to visit her. I was informed that she could not see any other visitor except myself. She informed me that the cell was extremely cold, and she was wearing a coat when I was there. I told the prison officials when I left that her cell was cold. I returned a few days later and found she had been placed in a cell that was too hot. She was still being kept in solitary confinement and complained that there was vermin in her bed and in her food. She also complained that she was still suffering from an illness which she had during the previous 6 months. I visited her several other times during the 10 days she was in the prison. On the eighth or ninth day, I believe, her parents were able to convince the United States marshal that they should be permitted to see her, and they did see her.

I inquired of the Wayne County jail officials as to the reason she was being kept in solitary confinement, and I was informed that it was on orders of the United States marshal. I asked them whether it was customary for United States prisoners to be kept in solitary confinement. They told me it was not customary, and that Federal prisoners were usually kept in the same way as other prisoners.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Who was it who told you this? What official?

Mr. GOODMAN. That official was the person in charge of the desk at the jail.

I went out to Milan prison to visit the men on Friday, February 9. I interviewed them and then had a discussion with the warden, Mr. Ryan. I asked him what privileges the prisoners would have. He told me that each prisoner was permitted 1 hour per month, which could be divided into two 30-minute periods for the purpose of visiting with relatives. He also stated that each prisoner was allowed $10 spending money per month, $2.50 per week, and an additional amount for newspapers and magazines. This money, of course, was to be provided by friends or relatives.

I asked him if the wives and families of the prisoners could come out to see them on the following day. He told me that the prisoners would have to fill out certain forms. I looked at the forms, and they included a complete statement of the history of each prisoner, including military record and other intimate information. I suggested that this form was apparently intended for prisoners who had been convicted. After some discussion, he finally agreed to eliminate a number of the questions. I went into the room where the prisoners were with the warden and told them that they would only have to fill out part of the forms, and if they did so their wives and families could see them the following day.

The following day several of the wives of the prisoners visited the prison and were told they could not see the prisoners because the forms shown to me the previous day by the warden had not been filled out properly. I telephoned Warden Ryan and asked him if he would not bring the forms in to the prisoners while their wives were there to have them filled out, as I knew they would be willing to do so. He told me he would not do this, as it would hurt discipline in his prison. After standing all day, the wives returned home without seeing their husbands. Protests were sent to the attorney general's office and to the warden of the prison, and on the following day I called the warden and he said everything would be satisfactory. Subsequently there was no further difficulty.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Were you satisfied with the prison form, as modified?

Mr. GOODMAN. Yes; as modified. But they told me they had filled it out as modified.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Who made bail, and when?

Mr. GOODMAN. The two doctors provided bail the same afternoon, February 6, and were released.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. The others never did?

Mr. GOODMAN. They were entirely unable to—all poor people.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. So they were in jail until the case was dismissed?

Mr. GOODMAN. That is correct. I believe they were released on the 16th.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Was the bail in the case of any one of them reduced after the arraignment?

Mr. GOODMAN. No. No legal attempt was made. Preparations were being made for an application for reduction to be filed when the defendants were released.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. The only member of the F. B. I. you talked with was Mr. Bugas?

Mr. GOODMAN. That's right.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. The first person you talked with, seeking permission to see your clients, was Mr. Lehr, who referred you to Mr. Bugas?

Mr. GOODMAN. He said I would have to see Mr. Bugas.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Then you saw Mr. Bugas; he refused to let you see your clients. Then you saw Mr. Lehr again at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, and again asked him for permission to see them?

Mr. GOODMAN. I will be unwilling to state that I asked him in so many words, but I think it was understood that Mr. Bugas told me I could not.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Would it be fair to assume from what you said to Mr. Lehr that you were appealing to him a second time?

Mr. GOODMAN. I made it clear to Mr. Lehr. I had gone to Mr. Bugas, and could not see my clients; now what? There was a book salesman waiting in his office. I suggested to him that he buy a copy of the Bill of Rights. So it was definitely understood that I was denied the right.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Did you protest that day to anyone about the chaining of the prisoners?

Mr. GOODMAN. No; not officially. We all protested, not only myself but other people in the courtroom. People who were present indicated horror at the way they were being treated, but no official protest was made.

Mr. SCHWEINHAUT. Do you have much criminal practice in the State or Federal courts?

Mr. GOODMAN. No. I have had criminal work, but my work is not criminal except on occasions.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have here the statements of a number of others of these persons. They are of about the same tenor as the statements of Mr. Hartley and the doctor which I have read. I selected the testimony at random, except that of Mr. Hartley, and I selected his because I had had a personal conference with him and because of the favorable opinion Mr. Schweinhaut had expressed of him. He stated that he thought he was telling the absolute truth, and evidently Mr. Hartley's statement made a deep impression upon Mr. Schweinhaut.

About the time these things were happening, after my first letter to the Attorney General, which the Attorney General published, I received a good many letters and communications from persons in different parts of the United States who had had experiences with the F. B. I. similar to those who were arrested in Detroit. Among others I received a letter from a man in my own State by the name of Carl J. Carlson, a man whom I never met, with whom I am not acquainted. The letter set forth his experience, and I think it can best be told by having the clerk read a copy of the letter I received from Mr. Carlson, dated March 13, 1940. His letter was written with pen and ink, but in order to make it easier for the clerk I have had it copied in typewriting. I send it to the desk and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

CARLSON, "THE MARKWELL MAN,"
Fremont, Nebr., March 13, 1940.

Hon. GEORGE W. NORRIS,
United States Senator, Nebraska, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The enclosed clipping, as well as other items along this same line, interests me a great deal, the reason being that I have had personal experience with this same organization.

I am a salesman, traveling out of Nebraska, covering all of Nebraska, all of South Dakota, and 26 counties in Iowa, maintaining my residence at Fremont.

On June 22, 1939, I returned home from a trip to Omaha, Nebr., on business. I had just reached home a little after 6 p. m. and was just sitting down to eat with my family, which consists of a wife, a mother-in-law, and three sons, 16, 14, and 11, respectively. The doorbell rang, and I went to the door, and there was Sheriff Gallagher, of my county, and another man, a stranger to me. The sheriff said, "Hello, Carl," and I answered with, "Hello, Jack." The sheriff asked me to step out on the porch, which I did. The stranger then asked if I was C. J. Carlson, to which I answered "yes." He then grabbed me and said I was under arrest by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, that he was Mr. Stein, of the Omaha office.

I, of course, wanted to know what for, and he told me I knew better than to ask what for. He told the sheriff to strip me. They took all of my personal belongings off of me.

My wife by that time had come to the door and demanded to know what it was all about. Mr. Stein pushed her back into the house, and Stein called for his men to come on in. They proceeded into the house and started a search. In a few minutes they came out and told the sheriff to bring me in. Then Stein told his deputy to put the cuffs on me, which they did, in front of my family. They then put me in the sheriff's car and took me to the Dodge County courthouse and told the sheriff to lock me up and keep me for the United States marshal, who would come and get me in the morning. I asked if I could call a lawyer and was refused permission. The sheriff then locked me up. The F. B. I. returned to my home and questioned my family further in regard to me.

I finally found that the charges were that I had been at Sioux City and while there was supposed to have impersonated a Federal officer and as such had cashed a bad check.

My daily report records, which I mail to my company each night and of which I retain a copy, revealed that on the day I was supposed to have done the crime I was in Chicago at the Palmer House, attending a company conference. Also, the man they were looking for had a scar of about 4 inches across the back of his neck. I have no scar. Also, the man weighed about 150 pounds. I weigh 190 pounds. Also, the man had dark hair. Mine is gray.

About 10:45 p. m. the same night they returned to the county jail and said they had talked to United States Attorney Joseph Votava, of Omaha, and they had decided to release me, but that I was still technically under arrest until the case could be cleared up.

I was therefore told I would have to go to Sioux City, Iowa, at my own expense, and be identified by the person entering the charge. This I did, and Mr. Farley, chief of detectives at Sioux City, had me taken to the woman who had made the complaint. She stated I did not even start to look like the man of whom she had given the description.

The details on all of this can be obtained from me and from Attorney Joe Cook, of Fremont.

Mr. NORRIS, I have never violated a law in my life. As the father of three boys I have tried to raise them to respect law and have always told them that when F. B. I. took a man they never made a mistake. I wonder, in the face of this, just what kind of jurymen my boys will make in the future, if called on to sit on a Federal case. Also, what future attitude will they have toward the law? I am greatly concerned as a father, and you, as my Senator, should and will help, I know.

No apology was ever made to me for this gross error, which caused grief and pain, plus expense on my part for trips and time lost from my work.

I have been told that I have no recourse against the Government. Have I? Certainly, a man who happens to have the same name should at least have a fair chance to explain, rather than to be manhandled as I was.

I am an ex-service man with war wounds and saw plenty of service in France with the Sixth Regiment United States Marines, and know in the service a man is guilty until proved innocent, but a citizen the court must prove guilty.

Sorry, Mr. NORRIS, this is so long, but I felt you would want some details. These can all be backed up with testimony, if necessary.

Also sorry it is not typed, but I am in a hotel room at Carroll, Iowa, writing this. If this has helped, I am pleased, and if you can help me, I would appreciate same.

Sincerely,

C. J. CARLSON, Fremont, Nebr.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I received this letter immediately before Mr. Schweinhaut called on me after he had been appointed by the Attorney General to investigate the Detroit cases. I had just read it when he came into my office, and I sent for the letter and handed it to him, and asked him to read it, stating that I should be very glad if he would call the attention of the Attorney General to it, and that while he was investigating the Detroit cases, he should also investigate that case. However, I understand he did not do so.

I did not know Mr. Carlson; I had never heard of him, and did not know what kind of a man he was. I immediately wrote to Mr. Cook, who is his attorney and who bears an excellent reputation in my State, an able, fine gentleman, as well as a good lawyer. He wrote me the facts as he understood them and, as we would expect, his recital of the facts corresponded with the story of Mr. Carlson himself.

I wrote the sheriff a letter asking him to tell me what kind of a man Mr. Carlson was. To that letter I received no reply.

I also wrote to the Federal district attorney at Omaha, with whom I am very well acquainted, and asked him about the case. He very promptly replied and gave me full information, his statement of facts not being very different from the statement of Mr. Carlson himself. I should be glad to read his letter to the Senate if it were not for the fact that he asked me to hold his letter as confidential, for the reason that the alleged crime occurred in Iowa, in a different district, that he had no jurisdiction over it, and that he happened to be mixed up in the case only because the arrest took place in Nebraska, and those interested in the investigation consulted him about holding Mr. Carlson.

I was anxious to know what kind of a man Carlson was that he should be called out of his home, and at once have handcuffs put on him, and be searched, and locked up in jail, without the privilege of consulting a lawyer, without the privilege of consulting anyone.

It is apparent that the F. B. I. agents, after they had locked him in jail, called the district attorney at Omaha, about 30 or 40 miles away, and, after they had talked with him over the telephone, they released the man from jail. I think it is fair to conclude that the district attorney advised them they had better not hold him. Anyway, he was released.

It happens that Mr. Carlson is a very poor man. There came into my office a representative citizen of Fremont, Nebr., a banker whom I have known for a good while, who has lived in Fremont for a great many years, a very prominent man, known pretty well over the State. He came to see me on some other business, but while he was there I asked him if he knew Mr. Carlson, and he said he knew him very well; that he had known him for years. I asked him what kind of a man Carlson was. He said Carlson was a very good man morally; that he had a very fine family, but that he had had a difficult time financially. He said that for several years, some time at least—I do not remember that he said several years—it had been nip and tuck with Mr. Carlson to keep his family off relief. But he had been associated in his time there with a great many good organizations, the Boy Scouts and such organizations; that he had a good reputation, and that he had a fine family.

It seemed to me that the F. B. I. ought to have exercised some kind of common sense in connection with this matter. Had they done so they would not have put this man to the disgrace and the expense they put him to. At his own expense he went to Omaha. Not being a lawyer, he supposed he had to talk with the district attorney there. When he got to Omaha and consulted the district attorney he was advised by him to go to Sioux City and submit himself there to the officers, and that they would take him to the woman who had made the charge against him. He went to Sioux City at his own expense. When he arrived in Sioux City he went to the offices of the proper officials. They took him to the person who had made the charge. It was a woman who ran a boarding house, and a boarder had come there, a man by the name of C. I. Carlson, who had boarded some time with her. He had left, and he represented that he was an employee of the Federal Government. He gave her a check in payment of his board, which on presentation was found to be useless, and she made the charge against him. I have an affidavit from her, in which she sets forth her description of this man. How anyone from that description would arrest the Mr. Carlson in question is more than I can comprehend.

I understand that when they arrested Mr. Carlson they searched his house, his garage, and his automobile, and they found a police badge in the automobile. That is about all I have heard they found against him. But they came back with the charge, "Why, this is a bad man, because he has a police badge in his automobile." I wrote to Mr. Carlson because I wanted to get his explanation of that matter. I received a letter from his wife. He was in the hospital, and afterward when he returned from the hospital he answered my letter.

Mr. Carlson is not an able-bodied man. He offered his services to his Government and served in the World War. He was wounded four times. From a man who lived in Fremont and knew him very well I got the idea, without his telling me in so many words, that because of his services in the World War Mr. Carlson was not physically a healthy, rugged man.

The affidavit of the woman which caused his arrest said Mr. Carlson had brown hair. His hair is perfectly gray. I understand his hair became gray because of his services in the World War. I understand that while he was serving and offering his life for his country, by reason of the hardships endured in that service, he lost his health and that his hair turned gray. While he is a comparatively young man, his hair is completely gray, without any shade of other color whatever in it.

I wanted to know whether he had a police badge, and I wrote to him. I received the following letter from his wife, directed to me and written from Fremont:

I am writing this for my husband, C. J. Carlson, Fremont, Nebr. Last week he received a letter from you asking if you might use the letter that he had written. It arrived the same day that he was stricken with a heart attack while working in Lincoln. Inasmuch as he is a disabled veteran, he is in the veterans' hospital there. He has authorized me to tell you to use the letter if you wish. He is well on the way to recovery now and will be home within next week or two.

This letter is signed by his wife.

Later on he wrote me a letter, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

FREMONT, NEBR., April 27, 1940.

Hon. GEORGE W. NORRIS,
Senior Nebraska Senator,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR NORRIS: This will acknowledge your letter of April 24, 1940.

In reference to the third and last paragraph of your letter, please be advised as follows:

To date Mr. Schweinhaut has in no way been in touch with me or any of my family.

With reference to police badge, which F. B. I. claims to have found in my car: This badge, together with authority, was issued to me by Mayor John Rohn when he was mayor of Fremont. Authority was renewed again under Mayor Fred Drew. The reason for this was that I organized Fremont's school-safety patrol to protect our Fremont junior- and senior-high students crossing a dangerous street in our town. At that time I was also a Scoutmaster and district Scout commissioner here. I did not deny possession of this badge, because question was asked if I had ever posed as a Federal man and as such ever flashed a badge. This, of course, I denied. The badge had hung over windshield in my car at all times. This badge was, however, taken by the F. B. I. men plus a complete search of my car and the breaking of a special pair of sunglasses in so doing.

As to the search of my house, Mr. Stein called in the men and they came in. There was two of the sheriff's men and one other man from the F. B. I. However, my wife had presence of mind to ask Stein if he had a search warrant. This stopped them. However, wife told him to go ahead as we had nothing to hide. Stein, as a result, made a cursory open search. He at that time took some of my personal papers and company reports, which he took to Omaha and which was returned about a week later under registered mail. This package we still have and it has never been opened and will not be until this is settled.

My business is that of a salesman on sales promotion work. The company I am employed for is Markwell Manufacturing Co., Inc., 200 Hudson Street, New York City, N. Y. They manufacture paper fasteners and stapling machines for office use, and also tackers, stitchers, and nailers for industrial use. My job is to place dealers and call on dealers for the office line. Also to call on industrial plants in regard to our industrial line. At the time of this false arrest I had under my contract the whole States of Nebraska and South Dakota and the 25 counties on the western border of Iowa, which includes Sioux City.

At the time of this occurrence I had gone into the employ of this company only from April 26, 1939. If company had been like some companies I know my job would not have been worth very much. As it is, things have not been as good as they might have been. There still is a sense of suspicion apparent.

You asked also if I could add anything beyond what your letter called for. In this connection I might state that a Mr. Ernie Kud-nell, who was with Mr. Stein, as associate operator, called at my home early the afternoon that I was arrested. I, of course, as stated before, was in Omaha. My mother-in-law, who was home at the time, answered the door. Mr. Kudnell asked for me; he was told I was at Omaha. He wanted to know when I would be back; he was told I was expected home about 6 p. m. He was asked if there was anything she could do. He informed her he was interested in Boy Scout work, and had hoped I was home so he could talk some things over with me. (I having been associated with scouting for some years.) He was told he could come back in the evening, and mother was sure I would be more than glad to visit with him.

Mr. NORRIS, when the F. B. I. has to hide behind the Scout organization I say it's time to call a halt. Is the F. B. I. unable to stand on their own feet, or do they need the Boy Scouts to help them. I, as a Scout man, with sons of my own in the organization, hereby register a definite protest against such tactics.

I trust this letter will be of assistance to you in this matter, and if I can be of further help, please so advise. You have my permission to check my record in any manner that you so desire in Fremont or any other place that I have resided. I hereby offer you a list of the following men, who you or the men in charge might write to in regard to me.

C. Petrus Peterson, Bankers Life Insurance Co., Lincoln, Nebr.; Lyle V. Barnes, general agent, Equitable Life Insurance Co., 907 Redick Tower, Omaha, Nebr.; Ellsworth Evans, past attorney general, South Dakota, Sioux Falls, S. Dak.; Axel Beck, attorney-at-law, Elk Point, S. Dak.; E. B. Moles, Malone & Moles, Sioux City, Iowa; Mr. Carroll Lockhart, president, Citizens National Bank, Watertown, S. Dak.; Victor Stafford, Iowa Light & Power Co., Sioux City, Iowa; also any attorney in the city of Fremont.

Sincerely,

CARL J. CARLSON.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, so far as I know, the facts in this case are absolutely undisputed. When this man got to Sioux City, and was taken by the officers to face the woman who had made the charge, she said, as he states in his letter, that he was not the right man at all, and that anybody reading the description which she had given, which was admittedly a proper description, could not possibly be mistaken about his identity. When the woman said he was not the right man, he was, of course, given his freedom. If he was technically under arrest, at least his case was dismissed, and he went home.

It is admitted in this case that the man was wrongfully arrested. I do not blame the F. B. I. for arresting him. He had the same name as the man who had evidently committed a crime. I realize that the F. B. I. had a right to arrest him. No fault could be found with his arrest. But the F. B. I. had no right to humiliate him, disgrace him, and injure him and his family for life. His boys will never forget. One is 16 years old, another 11, and the third in between the other two. They will never forget, Mr. President, that their father was brought from the porch into the house by the F. B. I. men, apparently to increase the disgrace of his handcuffing, so that he could be handcuffed in the presence of his entire family, consisting of his wife, his wife's mother, and his three boys. They will never forget that picture. That is a wrong to their young hearts which will last as long as they live.

It is because of such injury, Mr. President, and the things which inevitably follow, from which there is no escape, that I protest against the activities of the F. B. I. Long after we are dead the evil effects of their notorious mistakes and inhuman conduct will tell on the rising generation.

This man, on account of the service which he rendered to his country, is almost physically disabled from supporting his family. At his own expense he traveled from Fremont, Nebr., to Omaha, from Omaha to Sioux City, and from Sioux City back to Fremont. That expense would not mean much to a man in ordinary circumstances. However, it is a matter of great importance to a man who has the poorhouse door half way opened before him, and who has a wife, three boys, and a mother-in-law to support. That expense, amounting to a few dollars, was probably all that stood between him and public support. It is now admitted by Mr. Hoover, himself, that the man was absolutely innocent of any crime. The great boast, made throughout all this evidence, is that when the F. B. I. does something it never makes a mistake. In this case it was demonstrated that the F. B. I. made a mistake, which meant much to three young boys just coming into manhood in Fremont, Nebr. It meant a humiliation to the father and mother, in the presence of those boys, which is more than money can repay.

As the record shows, this man was a scoutmaster, engaged in many activities for the benefit of the public, and of young boys and girls. He, a poor man, was compelled to take from his meager earnings sufficient money to defend himself against a charge and prove his innocence. In other words, the burden of proof was shifted. The F. B. I. men were mistaken.

Mr. President, unpleasant as it is, I shall mention some other things in regard to the F. B. I. In mentioning them I still adhere to my original purpose to do good, even for the F. B. I.

Mr. Hoover, the head of the F. B. I., is the greatest hound for publicity on the American continent today. There is not a man sitting in the press gallery who will not privately admit it, from his own experience. Mr. Hoover has an organization, maintained at public expense, writing speeches for him to make or for anyone else to make who will take the speeches. When he makes a speech a copy is sent to practically every newspaper in the United States.

No organization that I know of meets in Washington without having some person appear before it to tell what a great organization the F. B. I. is. The greatest man of all, who stands at the head of it, never made a mistake, never made a blunder. In his hands lie the future and the perpetuity of our institutions and our Government. All such organizations adopt resolutions of commendation of this great man.

I talked with the editor of a daily newspaper in a Midwestern State, because some publicity had been given to this matter and to my original letter. The editor and publisher of that newspaper stated that he receives an average of one letter a week from Mr. Hoover. Whenever anything of a commendatory nature, or anything which could be construed as commendation of anything the F. B. I. has done appears in the newspaper, the editor receives a letter of approval from Mr. Hoover.

I have before me an article appearing in the New Republic of March 18, 1940. The heading is "G-Man Hoover's Nazi Plot." Here is what it says, or a portion of what it says—I am not going to read it all:

> Late on Sunday, January 14, the newspapermen were summoned to the F. B. I. headquarters in New York. Chief J. Edgar Hoover had a front-page story for them. He had just completed, he said, a roundup of 18 men who were plotting to overthrow the Government of the United States and to establish a dictatorship. He gave the press all the details.

Mr. President, it would be interesting to read all the article, but I do not believe I will do so because I have hesitated so far to talk about that particular activity of the F. B. I. for, as I understand, the men involved are now being tried. While I do not suppose anything that I might say would have any influence on the judge or the jury, yet the place where I said it might have some effect, and it has always been my practice to try to steer clear of discussing a case that was at the time being tried in court. In my humble way, Mr. President, in the little practice I have had in the country towns and villages, I have always endeavored to try my lawsuits, whenever I got such a thing, in court and not in newspapers. It seems to me that the F. B. I. would render better service if they would pay less attention to the publication of various kinds of incendiary charges which might be set forth in the headlines of newspapers and give publicity and notoriety to that organization.

I believe that the sheriff of a county who issues flaming announcements of what he is going to do in the way of making arrests, and as to the kind of case he has worked up, before the case is tried, makes a mistake. He may get greater publicity; he may get more praise and adulation and favorable comment from the newspapers by taking such a course, but, in the end the man who does the best work for humanity, society, and the Government is he who tries to do his work outside publicity avenues. The F. B. I., however, does not do that.

It is very easy to prove whether the statement I have just read is true or false; it is susceptible of definite proof. If it is not true, it would be very easy to prove that it is without foundation. Is it true that J. Edgar Hoover on Sunday, January 14, summoned newspapermen to F. B. I. headquarters? He either did or did not. If he summoned anybody there, those summoned ought to be able to testify and tell about it. Did he tell them what is alleged in the article he did tell them or did he not? If he did, it seems to me that he did something calculated to injure his own organization, for his organization particularly should keep out of the newspapers instead of trying to hunt ways to get into them.

There is another matter to which I wish to call attention. Whenever anything is said in regard to Mr. Hoover or the F. B. I., it is not long until a certain class of newspapers, and sometimes public men, in all sections of the country spring to the defense of Mr. Hoover. When my letter to the Attorney General and his reply were first given to the public, it was immediately said, "Here is another attempt to smear Hoover." That statement was in the headlines. The man who was denounced here the other day by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] wrote such an article and "smear" was the word used. I was, either by insinuation that could not be avoided or by direct statement, connected with all those accusations. One famous, well-known columnist devoted a whole column to my attempt "to smear Hoover," but of all the articles of that kind I have read not a single one ever stated the facts correctly. The statements that attacks on wire tapping were not well grounded have become so common that it seems to me they must have a common origin. Those who heard my first letter read today, and my second letter, will remember, since I called attention to it, that the words "wire tapping," or anything like wire tapping, was never, directly or indirectly, referred to by me. Yet that was connected with half the newspaper articles condemning me in particular for what they said was an attack on one of the greatest men who ever lived and who now held the future life of our country in the palm of his mighty hand.

I purposely, Mr. President, and with premeditation, stayed away from all but one ground. I think one might well have gone in other directions and might well have talked about wire tapping; but I did not do so. I do not agree that under all circumstances wire tapping ought to be condemned. One thing may be said about wire tapping—namely, that if a man's wires are tapped, and it is not found that he has done anything wrong, he is not hurt. His sense of independence may be shocked, he may be wronged in a legal sense, and his freedom may be interfered with; but if he has not committed a crime wire tapping will never convict him of a crime. I have said nothing about wire tapping up to this time; I have never used the term, as I remember. If I had my way about it, I would not make it completely illegal; but I have not charged the F. B. I. or Mr. Hoover with wire tapping. That is not the charge I have made. I have said that these men in Detroit—ordinary persons—some of them just as respectable as you, Mr. President, or I, were treated like common felons when they were arrested. I have said that there is a difference between a man charged with a crime and a man convicted of a crime. The men in Detroit were not even charged with a heinous crime, and yet they were treated like the worst felons. I find, on investigation and in talking with Mr. Schweinhaut, the Special Assistant Attorney General, who has made the report, that he believes—and since the report is approved by the Attorney General, I presume the Attorney General believes—that such a system of procedure is proper in a free country. I believe, if followed to its legitimate conclusion, it will destroy every vestige of freedom and that tyranny will take the place of liberty. I think the idea of giving a man a fair and honest trial when he is charged with a crime applies just as much to our enemies as it does to us; and, in my opinion, if we do not give justice to our enemies, the logical end will be that justice will not be meted out to us at a time when we shall stand sorely in need of it.

Mr. President, it is my humble judgment—probably no one will pay any attention to it, but at least I shall know that I have expressed it—that Mr. Hoover is doing more injury to honest law enforcement in this country by his publicity-seeking feats than is being done by any other one thing connected with his organization. It is my humble judgment that a man who continually tries his lawsuits in the newspapers will, before long, fail as a lawyer and be recognized as a failure by all who know him. A detective who advertises his exploits every time he gets an opportunity, who spends the public money to see that they are spread over the pages of the newspapers in flaming headlines will in the end be a failure in ferreting out crime and bringing guilty persons to justice.

Mr. President, it is not true that we can resort to the methods to which Mr. Hoover resorts and have success in our efforts to preserve human liberty. It is quite as necessary that we give a Communist a fair trial as that we give a Methodist a fair trial. It is quite as necessary that we protect a man charged with crime until he is found guilty, until he is shown to have committed some overt act, as it is to protect a man against whom no charges are made.

These men in Detroit were not bad men. Probably I would not agree with any of them. Probably you would not, Mr. President; but they have as much right to their ideas, whatever they may be, as we have. If they are charged with crime, it is important for the good of our country that they be treated with the same respect and dignity as would be accorded to you, Mr. President, if you were charged with crime. I say now, without fear of successful contradiction, that in most of these cases in Detroit if any discretion had been used—it seems to me if any common sense had been used—the men would not have been subjected to the disgraceful and humiliating procedure which was indulged in in their cases.

Unless we do something to stop this furor of adulation and praise as being omnipotent, we shall have an organization—the organization of the F. B. I.—which, instead of protecting our people from the evil acts of criminals, will itself in the end direct the Government by tyrannical force, as the history of the world shows has always been the case when secret police and secret detectives have been snooping around the homes of honest men. In my judgment, unless this procedure is stopped, the time will soon arrive when there will be a spy behind every stump and a detective in every closet in our land.

Mr. President, I close by reasserting that I have no ill will or bad feeling against this organization. It has done some wonderfully good work. It is capable of doing good work. One thing that can be truthfully said of it, I think, is that it is very efficient. But we cannot have it dominated by any individuals or by any groups who are looking to newspaper advertising for adulation every day of their lives, who arrest men and try them in the newspapers and not in the courts of law established under our laws, and who do not give to men charged with crime, especially when no malice is connected with their alleged actions, the full protection we would give to our own fathers, our own mothers, or our own brethren if we had the warrants to serve.

Mr. President, I have made these remarks with the hope that the conditions now prevailing may be improved in that respect, and that we may cease to follow a course which will put bloodhounds on the trail of honest citizens and permit their lives and liberty to be jeopardized by fellows who will wreak their vengeance under the guise of law-enforcement officers.

SUPPLYING OF DOLLAR EXCHANGE BY SILVER PURCHASES

During the delivery of Mr. NORRIS' speech,

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. An article appeared in the Times-Herald of Sunday, May 5, entitled "England's Need of United States Dollar Seen Increasing. Loss of Sterling Market in Norway Believed Factor."

The article is by Mr. Joseph Cerutti. It is a very interesting article from London. It deals with the very question which I was discussing yesterday, namely, the need and desire of Great Britain and France to obtain some of our agricultural products, particularly cotton. It also deals with the impossibility of Great Britain and France purchasing such agricultural products by reason of their lack of dollar exchange. As the balance of trade is against Great Britain and France, unless they are permitted to export into this country large quantities of their manufactured commodities, they cannot get dollar exchange. At this time, with a great many idle workers in this country, it is not desirable to reduce our factory production by the importation of manufactured articles from Great Britain and France beyond those which are now coming in.

I shall read the last paragraph of the article, which I then desire to have placed in full in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The vagueness of the statement—prevents even an approximate estimate being made, but the volume of unwanted purchases will need to be substantial if it is to make an appreciable difference to the American agricultural situation.

He concludes—

Where are the dollars coming from? All that are available we need for urgent war-material purchases. If more are spent on unwanted agricultural products, less will be available for planes and other war material from the United States.

Let me read a further paragraph from the article:

For this reason, Government officials and traders here are seeking to devise new measures to increase British exports to the United States. Cotton and rubber circles this week were busy discussing the chances of another big barter deal between Britain and America, and one report is that the negotiations already were under way.

I bring this up, particularly this paragraph, because yesterday the minority leader, the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], suggested that Great Britain did not need to purchase any cotton from the United States; that she could get it elsewhere. I took issue with that statement at the time. This article goes into the situation and clearly indicates that Great Britain is in dire need of cotton and other agricultural products. It calls attention to the fact that the necessity for dollar exchange is far greater now than it was, because Great Britain has been debarred from purchasing farm products and other materials in Norway and Sweden. As a matter of fact, Great Britain has been obtaining most of her butterfats and most of her agricultural products from Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. Those markets are actually cut off, and the products of those countries all go to Germany. Therefore, Great Britain is going to find it very much more difficult to obtain butterfats and agricultural products, because those markets are denied her.

Great Britain and France have been obtaining a large portion of their pork from Denmark. That market is now cut off. I do not know where Great Britain will obtain her butterfats and pork in the future unless from the United States. Yet this article plainly states that while Great Britain may have to resort to the United States, she has not the necessary dollar exchange. She cannot get the necessary dollar exchange except in two ways. One of them is for us to permit her exports to come into this country until there is a balance of trade. That I conceive to be impossible under the present situation. The other is to make available to Great Britain and France, without exportation to this country, commodities with which they can buy such materials.

That is the intention of the amendment I have offered. It is that Great Britain, without shipping her exports into our country, may ship them into Canada or Mexico or Peru or China or India, which have silver, and sell such exports for silver at 35 cents an ounce. She can afford to take silver at 35 cents an ounce if our Government will accept the silver at 35 cents an ounce if the proceeds are applied to payment for our exports of cotton, wheat, butterfats, and other agricultural products. I know of no other way by which dollar exchange can be supplied.

I offer the whole article to be published at the end of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of May 5, 1940]

ENGLAND'S NEED OF UNITED STATES DOLLARS SEEN INCREASING—LOSS OF "STERLING" MARKET IN NORWAY BELIEVED FACTOR

(By Joseph Cerutti)

LONDON, May 4.—Britain's need for American dollars to finance her purchases has become more acute, according to financial observers, as the result of the extension of hostilities to Norway and the loss of Scandinavian "sterling" markets.

For this reason, Government officials and traders here are seeking to devise new measures to increase British exports to the United States. Cotton and rubber circles this week were busy discussing the chances of another big barter deal between Britain and America, and one report is that the negotiations already were under way.

RUBBER FOR COTTON

The first barter deal provided for an exchange of 600,000 bales of cotton against 80,000 tons of rubber. Although the transaction is not yet completed, the idea of a new arrangement whereby Britain might obtain vital cotton imports without raising dollar balances finds many sponsors here.

Bitter criticism was voiced, however, over the results of the negotiations reported recently concluded in Washington by the Anglo-French economic experts, Frank T. A. Ashton-Gwatkin and Charles Rist. The Financial News, a leading market organ, complains that their activities have jeopardized the British Government's efforts in the last couple of months to close up the loopholes in the economic blockade of Germany.

PROMISES VAGUE

The writer admits that the terms of the official statement of the Allied pledge to do everything practicable to ease the effect of the blockade and other wartime economic policies on American trade are too vague to indicate the extent of the concessions made to the United States Government.

But, despite this, it expresses the fear it will result in a further increase in the volume of goods available for reexport to Germany through the neutral European countries or at best an accumulation of raw materials within striking distance of Germany.

Objections are raised to the Allies' reported agreement to release a certain amount of German exports to the United States arising from deals concluded before the blockade was extended in November to cover exports.

AID TO ENEMY SEEN

"This concession," the Financial News declares, "will provide Germany with additional dollar resources and enable her to increase her purchases of American goods whose shipment has been made possible by the concession the Allies made in the matter of neutral imports."

The Anglo-French undertaking to maintain as far as possible purchases of American agricultural products, including tobacco and fruit, provides another bone of contention which the writer seizes to accuse the Government of dissipating dollar exchange. These products, he claims, are obtainable in "sterling" countries or countries which do not require payment in dollars. The arrangement with the United States, the writer argues, involves an unnecessary loss of the British Government's dollar resources.

ESTIMATES IMPOSSIBLE

"The vagueness of the statement," he concludes, "prevents even an approximate estimate being made, but the volume of unwanted purchases will need to be substantial if it is to make an appreciable difference to the American agricultural situation.

"Where are the dollars coming from? All that are available, we need for urgent war material purchases. If more are spent on unwanted agricultural products, less will be available for planes and other war material from the United States."

THE SILVER ISSUE

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, following the remarks of the Senator from Nevada, an editorial from the Washington Post of May 7, 1940, and an editorial from the New York Evening Sun of May 2, 1940.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of May 7, 1940]

THE SILVER ISSUE AGAIN

Even those who oppose Senator TOWNSEND'S bill to discontinue foreign silver purchases no longer believe that the silver-buying program will achieve its original monetary objectives.

The only other halfway plausible argument in favor of continuing silver buying is that it is a useful instrument of foreign policy. But the chief beneficiary of our buying operations at present is Mexico. And Mexico has just shown her gratitude for our generosity by brusquely refusing to submit the claims of defrauded American investors to arbitration.

Generally speaking, the United States Government rightly refuses to act as collector for private investors. But when a foreign country takes over the property of American citizens, and fails to make the adequate and prompt compensation demanded under international law, it is not only the right but the duty of the Government to protest. Unfortunately, verbal protests have been of no avail in the case of Mexico. It is just possible that a sudden cessation of purchases of silver by the Treasury would produce a change of heart.

Whether or not that should prove to be the case, we have nothing to gain by continuing to buy silver from Mexico. On the contrary, the more silver we purchase abroad the more we stand to lose in the end from exchanging valuable goods and services for an overvalued metal for which we have no use. Moreover, silver purchases add to our already tremendous volume of excess bank reserves and thus aggravate an ever-present inflationary menace.

In short, there is no valid reason for obstructing passage of the Townsend bill now before the Senate. And there are numerous reasons—both economic and political—for urging its prompt approval.

[From the New York Evening Sun of May 2, 1940]

THE TOWNSEND SILVER BILL

As was to be expected, silver Senators are raising cries of anguish over the Townsend bill to put an end to the buying of foreign silver. But the Senate Banking and Currency Committee has approved it and prospects for its adoption at the present session of Congress have been materially improved. As presented by Senator TOWNSEND, of Delaware, on January 17, 1939, this bill would have repealed the Silver Purchase Act of 1934 under which the United States has paid domestic producers and foreign producers considerably more for their silver than it was worth. As reported with amendments on March 24, 1940, it merely separates foreign producers from this reservoir of financial nourishment. In the Senate on Tuesday, Senator TOWNSEND argued that the Government had bought about "two and one-third billion ounces, with absolutely no end yet in sight." Of his maimed measure, he said:

"After all the debate * * * it would be perfectly clear that my bill, which does not touch domestic silver at all, has as its sole objective the termination of the buying of foreign silver, a wasteful, unnecessary, pointless, and disturbing process. The case has long been clear. The hearings have been held. The Secretary of the Treasury has been heard. The State Department interposes no objection. The Federal Reserve System approves. Repeal is long overdue."

The most interesting sentence here is the one about the State Department. If Secretary Hull has made no objection, it is not because Mr. Hull is not particularly interested. He has not yet received from Mexico any satisfactory reply to his recent demand for arbitration of the claims of citizens of the United States whom Mexico has deprived of property through expropriation. Purchases of silver by the United States not only are important in that Republic's internal economy but also contribute materially to the financial resources of the Cardenas government. Nobody knows this better than Mr. Hull does. It therefore requires no vast stretch of imagination to interpret his silence as highly significant.

The silver-buying folly ought to be ended in its entirety, but in a campaign year that is too much to hope for. If silver Senators can prevent any amendment whatsoever they will do so. Some of them no doubt fear that to change any part of the present statute would endanger the whole of it.

After the conclusion of Mr. NORRIS' speech,

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 1542. An act to authorize the Director of the Geological Survey, under the general supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, to acquire certain collections for the United States;

S. 1780. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to acquire property for the Antietam Battlefield site in the State of Maryland, and for other purposes;

S. 3098. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to accept on behalf of the United States a bequest of certain personal property of the late Dudley F. Wolfe;

S. 3198. An act to provide allowances for uniforms and equipment for certain officers of the Officers' Reserve Corps of the Army;

S. 3262. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant a right-of-way to the Highway Commission of the State of Montana;

S. 3470. An act to amend the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, as amended, to provide for enlistments in the Army of the United States in time of war, or other emergency declared by Congress, and for other purposes;

S. 3633. An act to amend section 24e, National Defense Act, as amended, so as to add an alternative requirement for appointment in the Dental Corps;

S. 3654. An act to amend section 10, National Defense Act, as amended, with relation to the maximum authorized enlisted strength of the Medical Department of the Regular Army;

S. 3661. An act to amend the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, 1930, as amended, and for other purposes; and

S. 3675. An act to authorize the establishment of boundary lines for the Wilmington National Cemetery, N. C.

PROHIBITION OF FOREIGN-SILVER PURCHASES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 785) to repeal the Silver Purchase Act of 1934, to provide for the sale of silver, and for other purposes.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, yesterday I very briefly discussed the pending issue, after which I took occasion to mention the subject of immigration as it relates particularly to our sister republics to the South. From that subject I took advantage of the opportunity of drifting into a discussion of the general subject of immigration, about which too little has been said, and concerning which not enough has been printed.

This afternoon, after briefly discussing the pending issue and bringing particularly to the attention of the Members of this body some very pertinent editorials with regard to that most interesting subject, I shall again discuss in particular immigration into the United States from Mexico, and likewise the question of immigration into the United States from the countries of Central and South America, after which it will be my pleasure to discuss generally the subject of immigration—concerning which, as I have said, too little has been said, and not enough has been printed—on account of the great interest now being evidenced by the American public in reference thereto.

I have observed with much gratification that a number of leading daily publications of my State of North Carolina have commented very favorably upon the position taken by my distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I see on page 202 of the printed report of the hearings before the Committee on Banking and Currency an extract from an editorial printed in the columns of the Asheville Daily Citizen, of my home town, Asheville, N. C., on February 24, 1940, in which it is written:

"Futile and dangerous," the editors of the Asheville (N. C.) Citizen called this country's foreign silver policy on February 24, 1940, adding:

"The futility—in fact, the danger—of the Treasury's foreign silver-buying program becomes more apparent with every passing day. Our silver stocks are increasing constantly, yet they are still far from the goal set by the Silver Purchase Act of 1934. With each fresh purchase the excess of bank reserves swells, bringing closer the threat of inflation. * * *

"Abandonment of foreign silver purchases should be the first step in a concerted drive to reorient the basis of our national economy."

On page 217 of the hearings, I observe extracts from the editorial columns of the same newspaper, the Asheville Daily Citizen, under date of July 3, 1939, reading:

It seems only logical, therefore, that the foreign silver program should be allowed to lapse. Its "good neighbor" currency is in question. * * * One conclusion is inevitable: Silver purchases have done nothing to stimulate amicable foreign relations; nor to benefit our own domestic economy. Common sense dictates that they should be halted.

Again, on page 219 of the same printed hearings, I read an extract from an editorial published in the Louisburg Times, of Louisburg, N. C., the issue of June 30, 1939:

Mexico seems to be right much troubled over Congress' action toward the purchase of silver. But she is not much conscience-stricken for taking American property and business away from its owners. "The cat comes back sometimes."

Again, on page 218 of the same hearings, I have before me an extract from an editorial published in the Durham (N. C.) News, the issue of June 29, 1939, as follows:

The Senate has voted to discontinue foreign purchases of silver. * * *

The Senate action, of course, was not intended as a reprisal against Mexico. The Senate has passed the bill because of the effect it hopes it will have on our own economy.

But most of us feel that American interests have been grossly served in Mexico, and we must be excused if we do not greatly regret the plight in which Mexico soon perhaps will find herself.

In addition thereto, I note with much gratification contributions from the editor of the Charlotte (N. C.) News, or Observer—it is not designated which—the Wilmington Star, the Greensboro News, and another extract from the Durham newspaper. I wish to read them because I want them in the RECORD, and I hope those of our colleagues who are not present this afternoon will find an opportunity to read these statements from the pens of some of the most able editors in the State of North Carolina.

The editor of the newspaper published at Charlotte says:

Now, this silver is of no earthly use to us. We are surfeited with the stuff already. We have to go to the trouble of storing it and guarding it and taking inventories of it.

The editor of the Wilmington Star, of Wilmington, N. C., published by my distinguished friend the Honorable R. B. Page, says:

Why wouldn't it be simple good sense to apply the half million on the land claims and let Mexico keep her silver? Better still, why wouldn't it be positively astute to cease buying silver altogether and keep our own good money?

There is an idea there. I see here my distinguished colleague the honorable junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHANDLER]. Of course, he is not so much interested in silver as he is in gold, because many billions of dollars of gold are stored in the lovely green hills of his fine State, a State so ably represented by our distinguished leader, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], and the junior Senator, the fine former Governor of Kentucky. We are interested today primarily in silver, and my friend in the Wilmington Star suggests to my mind that we might at this time, at a time when our brothers across the Rio Grande will apparently not consider any negotiations suggested by the Secretary of State, tell them that we would be very much interested in negotiations leading to a transfer of the peninsula of Lower California, which is Mexican territory, to the United States of America, in part payment of our claims against the Mexican Government.

Here I digress to say that if we are actually, really, genuinely, sincerely interested in providing perfect protection for the western entrance to the Panama Canal, which is in the Pacific Ocean, we should acquire Lower California. It has been suggested by the President of the United States that we might acquire Cocos Island and Goose Island from the Republic of Costa Rica for that particular purpose, and if my colleagues will for the moment carry in their minds the geographic situation off the coast of Mexico, they will recall the peninsula of Lower California and that lying between the peninsula of California and the mainland of Mexico there is a body of deep water, where there could be concealed cruisers and battleships and innumerable submarines. At the point of that peninsula there could be established air bases and aquaplane bases without difficulty, without the expenditure of a great deal of money. If that territory should ever fall into the hands of an unfriendly nation, or if Mexico herself should ever become more unfriendly than she is at present, it might give us some considerable embarrassment in the protection of the Panama Canal. In connection with the question of properly guarding the entrance to the Panama Canal, and the additional locks for which we are about to make appropriation of $290,000,000, and for which we have made appropriations of $15,000,000, we are all interested in whether we want to carry out the suggestion of my distinguished and beloved friend from my sister State of Tennessee, the senior Senator from that State, the honored KENNETH MCKELLAR, that we construct the Nicaragua Canal.

At any rate, in protecting our interests in that portion of the Western Hemisphere, we should give some thought to the possible acquisition of Lower California, and this is the time to negotiate with Mexico to convey to us that Portion of her property in part liquidation of debts which have been due us as the result of seizures of property over a period of 20 years and for which, despite the negotiations which have been carried on, we have never been able to bring about a settlement. So I thank my friend the publisher of the Wilmington Star for providing me with a suggestion of that sort in the editorial from which I has just read extracts.

The Greensboro Daily News, of Greensboro, N. C., says, in part:

This country has subsidized Mexico by taking its silver, it has submitted to heavy tariff exactions, it has met expropriation of the property of its own and other nationals with patient requests for conferences, it has accepted grudging and unsubstantial promises of repayment mañana, it has sought in every way to cooperate.

There has been handed to me an extract of the proceedings of the debates of the Seventy-sixth Congress, first session, in which is printed a speech delivered by the Senator from Delaware, Hon. JOHN G. TOWNSEND, Jr. We find here another editorial from one of the Charlotte, N. C., newspapers, as follows:

Now, this silver is of no earthly use to us. We are surfeited with the stuff already. We have to go to the trouble of storing it and guarding it and taking inventories of it.

I believe that is an excerpt from an editorial which I brought to the attention of my colleagues a few moments ago.

I read from the Wilson Times, of Wilson, N. C.:

The projected fight for the repeal of Silver Purchase Act of 1934 may be defeated on the national-defense plea. Treasury authorities predict that this will constitute the basis of the administration defense of the act.

I have here an editorial pertaining to the pending subject, from the columns of the Asheville (N. C.) Times, a daily newspaper published at Asheville, N. C., entitled "Good Place to Stop." The editorial is as follows:

Heeding the advice of the Advisory Council of the Federal Reserve System, the Senate Banking and Currency Committee has approved the Townsend bill to end all purchases of foreign silver.

Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau opposes the bill, urging against it that it may worsen the already "chaotic" world conditions. But the arguments for continued buying of foreign silver are not all parallel to the case for purchasing gold, and the problem of accumulating silver stocks seems to be one which can be solved without the complications that would follow changes in the gold policy.

The Treasury now owns nearly three billions of silver, to which it gives a bookkeeping monetary price of $1.29 an ounce. The Treasury has spent almost a billion dollars for silver from abroad at an average purchase price of 52 cents. Today the market price is 35 cents, although the domestic-silver interests, whose importunities started the Government on its silver program, are receiving 71.1 for their silver.

Silver-State Senators declare that silver buying has helped China. Able economists, on the other hand, charge that it has also injured China's economic condition.

That statement is disputed

Mexico has made handsome profits selling the United States silver.

That is unquestionably true.

Senator TOWNSEND remarks that Mexico has reciprocated this good neighborliness by seizing American oil properties, and by mild threats of taking over mining properties if Washington stops buying Mexican silver.

I dare say that might happen. The editorial continues:

A huge silver store might under abnormal conditions not existing today become a temptation to currency inflation, which is one reason the Federal Reserve Council hopes to see a drying-up of the stream of foreign silver.

I am glad, indeed, that Mr. Hiden Ramsey, the editor of the Times, whose editorial I have justed quoted, is quite in accord with my attitude with reference to the pending issue.

Here is an editorial from the sister newspaper of the Asheville Times, the Asheville Star, entitled " 'Friends' and Silver." I wish to read the last paragraph of the editorial which I now hold in my hand.

In the meantime Mexico has seized American oil and cattle lands without paying for them. Furthermore, Mexico only last week sent a trade delegation to Tokyo which the Baltimore Sun describes as "an attempt to shift a certain amount of trade from the United States to Japan," on a barter basis.

This is hardly a shining example of neighborliness. Who, then, are our "friends" of the silver subsidy? To answer, Secretary Morgenthau will have to search a horizon that seems, for the moment, barren of reciprocal friendship so far as Uncle Sam's silver policy is concerned.

That, Mr. President, is unquestionably true. I ask that the entire editorial may be printed in full at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From Asheville (N. C.) Citizen of March 23, 1940]

"FRIENDS" AND SILVER

Over the opposition of Secretary Morgenthau, the Senate Banking and Currency Committee has approved a bill which would end the Treasury's policy of foreign silver buying. Since the committee's decision is likely to guide the Senate in its vote on the silver program, the merits of both arguments should undergo public examination.

It is an undeniable fact, as the committee majority maintains, that the goal of Treasury silver purchases has not been realized. The Silver Purchase Act of 1934 ordered the buying of both domestic and foreign silver until the Nation's monetary stock of the white metal "was equal to one-fourth of the stock of gold and silver combined or until the price of silver reached $1.29 an ounce."

As we have pointed out before, neither of these aims—directed credibly enough at the boosting of world silver prices—has been achieved in 6 years of buying. Silver stocks are still far below one-fourth; instead of rising to $1.29 an ounce, prices have declined. In the meantime the Treasury has in effect paid a large subsidy to foreign silver producers, who have been able to sell all of the metal they could mine to this country at fancy prices.

Mr. Morgenthau's argument before the committee prior to its vote admitted these points. In the main, however, it fell back on the old theory that American silver purchases serve to avert world economic chaos, and that our activity in the silver market benefitted our friends. In a more idealistic world, this contention might have some point. It is well to recall, however, who these "friends" are.

To some extent, of course, the silver program has aided China. It is well known, however, that many of China's silver mines have fallen into the hands of the Japanese. Canada is another friendly power, but the share of both of these nations in the American silver market hardly equals Mexico's. In the year 1936 alone Mexico produced more than one-fourth of the world silver supply, which we have been buying with only a brief interruption ever since. In the meantime Mexico has seized American oil and cattle lands without paying for them. Furthermore, Mexico only last week sent a trade delegation to Tokyo which the Baltimore Sun describes as "an attempt to shift a certain amount of trade from the United States to Japan," on a barter basis.

This is hardly a shining example of neighborliness. Who, then, are our "friends" of the silver subsidy? To answer, Secretary Morgenthau will have to search a horizon that seems, for the moment, barren of reciprocal friendship so far as Uncle Sam's silver policy is concerned.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I have before me a news article which a friend of mine clipped from the Baltimore Sun of April 24, 1940, entitled "Mexicans Storm United States-Bound Train. Three Hundred Fire Pistols and Yell 'Down With Friends of American Government!'"

I bring this to the attention of the Senate in view of the fact that some of the editorials I have just read make mention of the appreciation that has been and is now being evidenced by the Mexican Government for all the favors that we have conferred upon them, and particularly the favor of providing them with $30,000,000 worth of American products annually for their silver, which we have buried in the State of New York and are not using, and for which perhaps we will never find any use.

This dispatch is by a representative of the Associated Press, from Nogales, Ariz., on the border, and is dated April 23. Listen to this:

A yelling, pistol-shooting crowd stormed a United States-bound Southern Pacific train at Hermosillo, Sonora, today, frightened American tourists, and threatened two Mexican Air Force generals.

Gen. Gustavo Leon and Gen. Alfredo Lezama charged the demonstration was instigated by supporters of Avila Camacho, pro-Government candidate for President. The generals are leaders in the campaign of the antiadministration candidate, Juan Almazan.

LUGGAGE SEIZED

Lezama reported the train was surrounded by 300 men as it pulled into the Hermosillo station about 4 a. m. After firing pistols in the air and screaming insults, some of the men boarded the train, seized luggage and damaged property, he said. None of the cars occupied by Americans was entered, however.

That is well. Of all the tourists the Mexicans should welcome into their country, the American tourists should come first, because annually they pour millions upon millions of dollars over the borders of Mexico for the benefit of the Mexican Government, and tourist dollars can be just as easily spent, and are worth just as much as any other kind of a dollar. Why Mexico should turn upon us at this hour, when we are supplying her with 400,000 tourists a year, is beyond my comprehension. The Mexican people do not seem to have any appreciation whatsoever for the friendly attitude which has been displayed and evidenced by us for many years past. If they continue in that attitude I say that the probabilities are that we shall be called upon to warn the American tourists that if they enter Mexico they will have to do so at their own peril, and take the consequences of any injury they might sustain, or any robbery that might be committed upon their persons.

I continue to read from the Associated Press dispatch:

Ben R. Meyer, Los Angeles businessman, said he was awakened by the shouting and shots. Thinking it was a celebration, he stepped from the car, only to be hustled back by fellow travelers.

Luis Castellanes, Los Angeles attorney, said the demonstrators cried in Spanish:

"Down with Almazan! Down with friends of the American Government!"

DEATH THREATS MADE

The Mexicans threw bottles, brandished pistols, and "threatened to kill us," Castellanes said, adding that at Empalme, where a smaller disturbance occurred, the two generals were warned by telegram not to leave the train at Hermosillo or they "would be killed."

Twenty-two students of the exclusive Southern Arizona School for Boys, Tucson, and two faculty members were aboard.

Lezama said he and Leon offered no resistance to the demonstrators because "a shooting affray would have imperiled the lives of many American tourists," and "there might have been killings which would have caused international complications."

The demonstration at Hermosillo followed a smaller but similar one at Ciudad Obregon.

Generals Leon and Lezama telegraphed a protest to President Lazaro Cardenas.

Mr. President, it is unfortunate, indeed, I repeat, that our neighbors to the south are not grateful for the many favors we have done them, the kindnesses we have shown them, and the large amount of American dollars we have poured into Mexico through the continued purchase of silver and through our tourists, who are going to Mexico annually in numbers exceeding 400,000. I say it is unfortunate. In order that the officials of the Mexican Government may know that personally I am not unfriendly, that I am simply interested in the welfare of the American people, I wish to say that there is no more colorful, there is no more historically interesting country in the Western Hemisphere than Mexico itself. I may say in passing that we should continue on friendly terms with Mexico in order that American tourists, now particularly when they cannot go abroad, might take advantage of the opportunity to visit the countries to the south, for in those countries there are many things which will appeal to them.

I may add in passing, to add strength to my statement that I have no personal feeling in regard to the matter, that if an American tourist desires to see what in effect is a great portion of the world, in one trip, at a minimum cost, he should go to Mexico. After gliding down by motor to Laredo, he will, within 2 days after arriving there, find himself in Mexico City, that beautiful capital which is 7,200 feet above the sea level and is a very interesting place historically.

What do we find in Mexico? We find the things which we go to India to see, and to Egypt, Holland, the Rhineland, Belgium, France, China, Italy, and Peru. For example, we go to Egypt to see the pyramids. In Mexico are the pyramids of the sun, the moon, and a hundred others; but those two are almost equal in size to the pyramids found in Egypt near Cairo. We go to India to see the great open temples. Mexico has them, almost as spacious and magnificent. We go to the Rhineland, Belgium, and Holland to feast our eyes upon magnificent edifices in the form of cathedrals. One of the most spacious and grand cathedrals in all the world is to be found in Mexico City itself.

We go to Venice to ride upon the silent waters of the canal, and to feast our eyes upon the beautiful girls to be seen from the boats in which we ride. Not far from Mexico City, at Xochimilco, are lovely canals, music, and loveliness in every form.

We go to Peru to go down into the bowels of the earth and see the great silver mines. There are also great silver mines in Mexico.

We go to Switzerland in the summertime to see the great snow-capped peaks. In Mexico we can stand in the midst of a banana plantation and see great, towering mountains. I would that many Americans who heretofore have been spending their time and money in Europe might go southward to see the wonders of Mexico.

By the way, after we have learned American history and visited all the American States, we ought to go to Mexico because Mexico presents a history surpassed in interest only by the history of the United States. There is no history more thrilling than that of Mexico, when we consider the time when first Cortez set foot upon the shores of Mexico in 1519, and with about 120 soldiers went up to Mexico City and conquered a million Aztecs.

The present situation is unfortunate. I should like to see American tourists visit Mexico, but I want to see them come out unharmed and unrobbed. Probably the time will come when we shall have to warn American tourists. We have not been treated fairly by the government to the south. We cannot obtain a settlement from it, but we continue to make purchases of silver from Mexico to the extent of $30,000,000 a year, and bury the silver in New York, favoring Mexico all the time, when constantly and almost daily there are demonstrations against us.

Yesterday I mentioned the fact that it has been estimated that there are more than 1,000,000 Mexicans in this country. Some of them are here legally. Some of them have come in legally and remained illegally. I venture the assertion that the greater portion of the 1,000,000 Mexicans have come in illegally and remained illegally. I think the time has come when we should put a stop to it, particularly when in this country today approximately 10,000,000 Americans are out of employment, men and women, young and old, who are seeking employment. The time has come when we must look after the interests of the American people first. After we have cleaned house and taken care of our own people, after we have seen to it that Americans are properly cared for by way of employment, we may devote any time we have left or any energy we may have to spare to those who live outside our territories, insular possessions, and continental United States.

The Mexicans who are in the United States are taking advantage of our opportunities for labor. They are coming across the border without any difficulty. We all know that the quota system does not apply to the Western Hemisphere. It does not apply to Canada, or to Mexico, Nicaragua, Honduras, Guatemala, Salvador, Costa Rica, Panama, Colombia, Venezuela, or Ecuador. It does not apply to Chile, Peru, the Argentine, Brazil, Bolivia, Uruguay, or Paraguay. It does not apply to a single country in the Western Hemisphere.

What is the result? Hundreds of thousands of persons who are desirous of getting out of Europe are coming to the various countries in the Western Hemisphere, in some of which, I am told, it is not difficult to acquire citizenship. Once such citizenship is acquired, it is not difficult to enter the United States, where ultimately all such refugees want to come. Why? Because, unfortunately, they know that we are so neglectful of our own home-grown citizens that anyone who can speak a foreign language, or speak the English language brokenly, can get a job when an American citizen cannot do so. That fact is evidenced in every section of the United States today. Every week ships from foreign shores are unloading refugees and immigrants from foreign lands; and no sooner have they landed upon our shores than jobs are provided for them. How? By way of creating jobs for them, or by way of discharging American citizens to make places for the new arrivals from across yonder Atlantic Ocean.

In that connection, I have been impressed with the fact that the American people as a whole are becoming sick and tired of that sort of thing. Whenever difficulty comes in this country it will come from native-born and naturalized American citizens, who will protest against continuing the attitude which we have evidenced by permitting thousands upon thousands to come from foreign lands and usurp the jobs which rightly belong to Americans. The American people are slow to wake up, but when they wake up they will demand action. They will demand that Americans be provided for before we provide for those who come from over the sea.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I gladly yield to my distinguished colleague from the State of Washington.

Mr. BONE. The Senator has indicated that there are no quota restrictions on anyone seeking entry into the United States from any of the countries of the Western Hemisphere. What qualifications or restrictions are imposed on anyone coming to the United States from any of the countries composing the Western Hemisphere?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Of course, as the Senator knows, we having a quota for the world, exclusive of the Western Hemisphere, which has permitted 153,000 annually——

Mr. BONE. I am interested now only in the countries of the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am coming to that. In that connection, in view of the inquiries I have received, I wish to add that many foreign countries have not filled their quotas; but in the Western Hemisphere there is no restriction upon those who come to the United States from Mexico or from any of the countries of Central or South America. If they are citizens of those countries they may come into the United States without limitation as to numbers.

Mr. BONE. Is there not a requirement with respect to a financial showing which will keep the entrant from becoming a public charge? Does not the Bureau of Immigration impose some sort of requirement that a man be able to care for himself? Are the barriers completely down with respect to all the countries in the Western Hemisphere?

Mr. REYNOLDS. So far as those who come from across the Atlantic are concerned, there is such a requirement; but according to the information I have, when immigrants come from the Western Hemisphere that requirement is not necessary in all cases. I remind the Senator of the fact that when immigrants are permitted to come into the United States from countries in the Western Hemisphere there is no difficulty whatsoever.

The thing in which we should be vitally interested at the present time is the number of persons who are crossing the Canadian border or the Rio Grande, for, as the Senator knows if he has ever motored across from Canada into the United States or across from Mexico into the United States, it is not at all difficult to get by. That circumstance is largely attributable to the fact that we have not a sufficient number of men in the Department of Labor to guard well the borders, which should be well guarded now of all times in the history of our country.

Mr. BONE. Let me ask the Senator about a matter which has been brought to my attention a number of times. I am not certain of the facts, and therefore I inquire in order to inform myself. I know of a number of cases of persons coming into the United States from Canada who have subsequently been taken into custody by immigration officials and returned to Canada because they did not meet the requirements for admission into the United States.

If a Canadian or a Mexican or a Costa Rican or a Brazilian may enter the United States freely without restrictions of any kind, how does it happen that a citizen of Canada, for instance, who enters the United States will be subsequently taken into custody and sent back to Canada?

I will say frankly to the Senator from North Carolina that I have not understood that the barriers are clear down and that 10,000,000 Mexicans may come into the United States if they merely elect to come across the border. I think it is news to all of us if there are no restrictions at all.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, as evidence of the fact that we have no restrictions I have but to cite to the Senator the fact that there are in this country hundreds of thousands of Mexicans. If we had had a quota system for the Western Hemisphere, which naturally would have applied to Mexico, we would not have in the United States today a million Mexicans, part of whom have taken the jobs of American citizens and part of whom are on relief, paid for by the taxpayers of this country. I believe the last report showed that annually there cross and recross the American border from Canada about 50,000,000 persons. Today it is impossible for us to secure from any department of the Government a statement of the exact number of persons who are passing over the Mexican border. We are lacking in personnel to check up on that matter. We do not even know the number of aliens in our country at this time.

By the way, as to my use of the word "alien," I desire to set myself right with those who honor me by listening now, and with those who perhaps will read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD tomorrow or thereafter. When I employ the word "alien," I refer to the individual who comes from a foreign land, arrives in this country legally, and remains here illegally; or who arrives here legally and remains here legally, but does not choose to make application for American citizenship; or the person from a foreign land who comes here illegally and remains here illegally.

As I have stated, we have no idea as to the number of aliens in this country. I say that now, of all times, we should know how many aliens are here, where they came from, when they came, why they came, where they now are, and what they are doing; and I wish to state in passing that my reference is to the aliens who have violated our law by entering this country, and who are continuing to violate it by staying here illegally.

Some of our finest American citizens came from foreign shores. Some of the finest men we have in American life are those who chose to come here and to make application for American citizenship. I speak only of those who are here as a result of having violated our law to get in, or who have stayed here, in violation of the law, after they arrived.

I was reading, a moment ago, something that reminded me of the fact that we should require aliens in this country to be fingerprinted. As I have already stated, at this time, the Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice is daily receiving about 250 complaints concerning sabotage and espionage. Prior to the declaration of war in Europe on September 3, that bureau of the Government received only about 250 such complaints annually. In other words, we are, today, receiving daily about the same number of complaints that we received annually prior to the declaration of war in Europe; and this is occurring at a time when we are at peace. I wonder how many complaints that division of our Government would receive were we engaged in war—and we may become engaged in war. We may unfortunately be sucked into the war; and I am beginning to think daily that the probabilities of that result are growing as I read the editorials in various newspapers and articles in the press throughout the country, in which some persons venture the opinion and very frankly state that we cannot escape participation in the European war.

So far as I am concerned, I will never vote to send a single son of an American mother to Europe or Asia or anywhere else to settle anybody else's quarrels. So much for that; but I say now, when there are a large number of spies and saboteurs in this country, that we ought to have a registration and fingerprinting law, for two reasons. The first is to ascertain the number of aliens in the United States. Miss Perkins, the Secretary of Labor, has estimated that there are 3,300,000. Hon. MARTIN DIES, according to a news dispatch from Chicago which I read some time ago, estimated that there are 7,000,000. I estimate that there are about 4,000,000. The American people are entitled to know how many aliens there are in the United States today; and after they have ascertained that fact they are entitled to know where they came from, how they came, when they came, why they came, whether they entered the country illegally, or whether they entered the country legally and remained here illegally. The American people are entitled to know that now, and the American people are going to demand that they be furnished with that information.

In addition to ascertaining the number of aliens in our midst in order that we may take an accounting of our unemployed, I say that if we were unfortunately to be sucked into the war we should then be in a position to ascertain where all aliens are, because at the time we were dragged into the war every person in the United States, who is not a citizen of the United States, would of necessity be considered a potential enemy of this Government; and we are entitled to know where our enemies are, and what they are doing.

Mr. President, we read a great deal about sabotage. We have been talking about protecting the Panama Canal. Here is an article which I happened to clip this afternoon from the Herald Tribune of New York, entitled "Sabotage Held Chief Peril to Panama Canal; General Strong Asserts Steps Are Taken To Prevent It; Sea Defense Adequate."

We are spending a great deal of money down there with the idea of protecting the Panama Canal in reference to our friends south of the Rio Grande, the Mexicans who are demonstrating against the American Government. Those demonstrations naturally will spread southward. The unfortunate thing about the matter is that it is alleged that thousands of Mexican Communists are coming into the United States for the purpose of preaching the overthrow of our Government, and joining the Communists who are in the United States today in demanding a fundamental change in our form of government.

Mr. President, today I read something in the New York Sun to which I desire to call attention. Speaking of Communists, we have enough of them of our own in this country, and there is no necessity of our permitting more to enter from Mexico. I have here a letter which was published in the Public Forum column of the Sun, reading as follows:

CRITICAL REVIEW AND ANALYSIS OF THE MAY DAY PARADE

To the EDITOR OF THE SUN.

SIR: I watched the May Day parade, the last half consisting of 15,000 Communists. The contrast with the parade of last year was most marked. There were signs this year urging an embargo of Japan, but none of Germany. Signs like last year's attacking Hitler were conspicuously absent. Last year Roosevelt was praised in the banners for his speech "quarantining aggressors"; this year he was condemned as a "warmonger." America's appropriations of two billions for natural defense were attacked under "Bread, Not Guns," but nothing was said about the $9,000,000,000 (not ruble) appropriation for armaments by the Soviet Union, which appropriation was praised that morning by the Daily Worker.

If the Communists want to parade as they did behind the red flag of Russia, that is all right with me. but I object to the use of the American flag by 15,000 men and women whose first allegiance is to a foreign power and who take orders (even to their thinking) from this foreign power. Here was America's "Fifth Column" advertising itself to the American public.

Quite appropriately the Communists were followed right on their heels by six trucks from the department of sanitation washing the streets. It took all six to do the job, too.

J. L. WICK.

NEW YORK, May 3.

This man must have been there and made close observation of what went on. It is well that the city had the trucks at that time for utilization for that purpose.

I ask at this point that the article from the Herald Tribune, which I brought to the attention of the Senate a moment ago, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SABOTAGE HELD CHIEF PERIL TO PANAMA CANAL—GENERAL STRONG ASSERTS STEPS ARE TAKEN TO PREVENT IT—SEA DEFENSE ADEQUATE

WASHINGTON, May 6.—The Army's Assistant Chief of Staff declared today that the greatest danger to the Panama Canal—keystone of hemisphere defense—was in sabotage.

"Sabotage may take many forms," Brig. Gen. George V. Strong told the Society of American Military Engineers. "A vessel might be blown up in the locks; time bombs might be dropped in the locks; dams might be blown up; vital installations, such as control mechanisms or power sources, might be damaged or destroyed.

"But these possibilities have all been foreseen," he added, "and steps have been taken to minimize, or in some cases nullify, efforts along this line."

A new set of locks, which may be started this summer for completion in 1945 or 1946, would improve the national-defense situation, he said.

At present, with double sets of locks, side by side, "it is quite possible that one lucky hit of a large bomb (from the air) or a heavy explosion in one lock chamber would be sufficient to put the Canal out of commission."

General Strong described the Canal's defenses against sea attack as "adequate to meet and vanquish" an attacking naval force. He deemed the Canal's mobile military force "adequate to meet any initial raids of a landing force."

With the Canal reasonably safe, he said, the joint defense task of the Army and Navy is "to deny an aggressor the seizure and establishment of bases from which he can operate against us or against any other American republic, or against the Canal."

Among other areas where an aggressor might wish to establish such a base, he named Newfoundland (from which air attacks could be made as far south as Washington), the Bahamas, Puerto Rico, Natal, Cuba, Jamaica, the western coast of Central America, and the west coast of Mexico.

Present wars in Europe and in Asia, he said, have shown that, in defending the American continent, "we must be prepared to outblitz the blitzkrieg."

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, in closing I wish to refer briefly to a resolution before this body, which was offered by the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. HOLMAN]. He submitted the resolution some time ago, and it reads, in part, as follows:

That the Committee on Immigration, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete investigation of the immigration of aliens into and the deportation of aliens from the United States with a view to determining, among other things, (1) the extent to which aliens have been permitted to enter or remain in the United States in violation of the immigration laws, (2) whether any deficiencies exist in the immigration or deportation laws or in the administration thereof which permit undesirable or deportable aliens or aliens who compete with citizens of the United States in securing employment to enter or remain in the United States, and (3) necessary steps to be taken in order to correct any such deficiencies and to prevent the continuation of any violation or circumvention of the immigration or deportation laws. The committee or subcommittee shall report to the Senate, at the earliest practicable date, the results of its investigation, together with its recommendations.

Mr. President, I submit that the American people are entitled to answers to those questions propounded by the Senator from Oregon in his resolution. I hope that we may see fit to provide the committee with the money with which to conduct the investigation. By the way, the resolution was favorably reported by the Committee on Immigration. It is time we made an investigation into the immigration problem. It is time we should ascertain whether or not our immigration and deportation laws are being properly administered. Many people wonder how in the world immigrants continue to enter the United States outside the quotas. They come in on visitors' visas, and when they get here they never have to leave. They can lose themselves in the mass of the 135,000,000 inhabitants of the United States, and we have difficulty in ever finding them, because we have no registration and fingerprinting law in this country.

Thousands enter our country on students' visas. One will get a visa permitting him to enter this country so that he may study in our universities, then he has the visa continued from time to time, and does not comply with the regulations, and does not leave. It is not the fault of the law, it is the fault of the administrators of the law. They are the ones who have permitted these aliens to enter under students' visas and under tourists' visas. They are the ones who should be condemned.

I can give an illustration, and then I shall conclude. A young Hindu came to this country about 17 years ago from a place in India. He advised the State Department that he was desirous of entering this country for the purpose of pursuing his studies, and he was permitted to enter on a student's visa. I understand he wanted to become an engineer.

This young man went to Raleigh, N. C., where he entered the State college. During his college course he remained here on a student's visa, which was continued from time to time. After he had graduated, he decided that he wanted to live in the United States of America, as all foreigners wish to remain in the United States, the best country on the face of the earth. He decided he wanted to stay here, and in that he exhibited very good judgment.

After this man left college he married a North Carolina girl, and as a result of that marriage there were born two children. I believe they have a little boy 5 years old and a little girl about 18 months old, according to my recollection of the facts, as gathered from a newspaper article published in one of my home-State papers. Time and again this man made application for a continuation of the student's visa. This Hindu gentleman, who was not a citizen of the United States, and who, under our laws, could never become a naturalized citizen, married a North Carolina girl, and as a result of that union there were born two children, as I have just stated.

A short time ago a warrant of deportation was issued against him. It was served, and he was to appear in the city of New York along with a group collected there for deportation by the Labor Department. He was so distressed because he would have to leave the United States and would have to be separated from his dear little wife and his lovely little children that the newspaper reports stated he attempted to take his own life by throwing himself beneath the wheels of a swift-passing locomotive. He was taken to the hospital. North Carolina was up in arms over the fact that this Hindu gentleman, who had married a North Carolina girl and was the father of two children, who are American citizens, since they were born in this country, had to be dragged from the arms of his wife. She was crushed. My heart went out in sympathy to her, and for that man I had a feeling of sympathy, despite the fact that being an intelligent man he must have known that he could never become an American citizen, that the law would not permit him to become naturalized; but he married this girl and they wanted to take him away. To take this man away will crush that dear little wife; it will render fatherless those two dear little children and bring misery and unhappiness into their lives. In my heart I have deep sympathy for them.

Mr. President, whose is the fault? I shall not discuss whether or not this gentleman himself knew that he could never become an American citizen, but I say that the fault was with the administrators of the law. Some of our newspapers editorially condemned a law which would snatch away this husband and father. I do not condemn the law, but I condemn the administration of the law. If those who are charged with the proper administration of the law had done their duty, that Hindu gentleman from India would have been deported, and as a result thereof he would not have married in the United States, and the time would not have arrived when he would bring unhappiness to his dear wife and to his innocent little children who have to suffer. I am in entire sympathy with the gentleman. I think that because of the negligence of those in charge of the administration of the law itself, they are to blame, and that some relief should be extended to that man and to his wife.

Mr. President, again I want to urge that a sufficient appropriation be provided for the investigating committee suggested by the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. HOLMAN], because I think the time has arrived when we should be permitted to obtain the information he seeks, which is so vital to the welfare of the people of the United States.

Mr. President, I wish to repeat that, in my opinion, there is no subject more important to the people of America today than the one I have just mentioned. I am against permitting thousands upon thousands of aliens to come into this country, now or at any time, and taking the places of American citizens. I am tired of seeing American taxpayers obliged to support those to whom we have no obligation whatsoever, and who have come here illegally.

By the way, that brings me to the question of crime. In this country crime costs the American taxpayers about $18,000,000,000 annually. Hundreds of crimes are committed every hour in our land. A recent statement, made by a former commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service of the Department of Labor, says that there are 20,000 alien criminals in the United States today. We ought to be ashamed of ourselves for permitting such a condition to exist.

Where is our sense of responsibility to the people of the United States when we permit 20,000 alien criminals to remain in this country? I do not know.

Mr. President, to understand what is going on all we have to do is to read the recent report issued by the former Attorney General of the United States, Mr. Homer Cummings, as to the cause of crime. It is not even necessary to do that. All one needs to do is to pick up New York and Philadelphia newspapers. In New York City we find that they have Murder, Inc. I wish I had before me now a list of the names of those who were the officers of Murder, Inc., who committed murder for fees ranging anywhere from $10 to $5,000, according to how big a shot the competing gangster happened to be. I wish I had that list here. I made a note of it the other day after seeing it in a recent issue of Life magazine.

If Senators desire further information, let them look through the columns of the Philadelphia newspapers, in which were recently described most dramatically what was done in that city by a gang of poisoners. Read their names and find out where they came from, and how they came into this country. It has already been ascertained that many persons identified with Murder, Inc., in New York, and many identified with the poisonings that have occurred in Philadelphia, are aliens who came into this country in violation of the laws of our land.

Mr. President, I ask, where is our sense of responsibility?

TERMS OF COURT AT WINCHESTER, TENN.

During the delivery of Mr. REYNOLDS' speech,

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me for a moment?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. STEWART] is interested in having the Senate pass a small local bill concerning the holding of court in the town of Winchester, Tenn. The committee unanimously reported the bill. I have spoken to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] about the bill, and its consideration is agreeable to him. Will the Senator yield long enough to have the bill considered and passed?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 3828.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the title of the bill for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 3828) to amend section 107 of the Judicial Code, as amended, to eliminate the requirement that suitable accommodations for holding the court at Winchester, Tenn., be provided by the local authorities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 107 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 edition, title 28, sec. 188), is amended by striking out "Provided, That suitable accommodations for holding the courts at Winchester, Columbia, and Cookeville shall be provided by the local authorities without expense to the United States until, subject to the recommendation of the Attorney General of the United States with respect to providing such rooms and accommodations for holding court at Columbia, a public building shall have been erected or other Federal space provided for court purposes in said city," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, That suitable accommodations for holding the court at Cookeville shall be provided by the local authorities without expense to the United States: Provided further, That suitable accommodations for holding the courts at Winchester and Columbia shall be provided by the local authorities, but only until such time as, in the case of each of such cities, such accommodations shall have been provided, upon recommendation of the Attorney General, in a public building or in other quarters provided by the Federal Government for such purpose."

After the conclusion of Mr. REYNOLDS' speech,

TRADE OF THE UNITED STATES WITH RUSSIA

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have just received some up-to-date figures from the Department of Commerce relative to exports from the United States to Russia, and in order to keep the record up to date I should like to read just a few of the figures into the RECORD.

The figures I give represent the value of exports, including reexports, from the United States to Russia. The figures begin in June 1939, with exports amounting to $262,000. In July the exports amounted to $3,201,000; in August the exports amounted to $3,712,000; in September, $1,785,000; in October, $8,626,000; in November, $7,282,000.

Then the figures shoot up in December to $11,922,000. In January 1940, the exports amounted to $13,066,348. I do not know whether or not that was due to the war with Finland.

In February 1940, the exports were $7,320,033.

The figures for the month of March this year, which have just become available to me, are $9,088,691.

Here is how the last figures compare with the month of March, going back 4 years. In March 1937, the exports to Russia were worth $3,094,000; in March 1938, $6,489,000; in March 1939, $6,791,000; and in March 1940, $9,088,691. The exports for the month of March 1940, are higher than the exports in any previous month of March.

It is noteworthy that some of the largest items in these exports were refined copper in ingots, cathodes, billets, bars, or other forms; brass and bronze plates and sheets; power-driven metal-working machinery. All these articles and goods are of tremendous value in conducting war; a fact, I should think, which would be of interest to all those who have been told that America helped the Russian campaign against Finland, and who read in the press that all goods that go to Russia are subject to transshipment to Germany.

Mr. President, this raises the question of what is the foreign policy of the administration, a foreign policy which seems to favor making as much money as possible out of both sides.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the itemized statement by the Department of Commerce setting forth the facts in detail regarding our exports.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, MAY 7, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Reverend Stewart M. Robinson, D. D., pastor of Second Presbyterian Church, of Elizabeth, N. J., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou hast granted human government for the welfare and happiness of mankind. Bless now these Thy servants gathered here transacting important business of this great Nation. Endue us all with the true sense of Thy majesty and Thy glory. Use us fruitfully in Thy service, for we ask it all through the merits and the grace of our Lord, Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a concurrent resolution of the House of the following title:

H. Con. Res. 62. Concurrent resolution to provide for printing additional copies of hearings held by the Committee on Appropriations.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 8745) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. McKELLAR, Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, Mr. ADAMS, Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. NYE, and Mr. HOLMAN to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6264) entitled "An act authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes."

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZPATRICK]?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks and to include therein an amendment I offered to the Social Security Act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZPATRICK]?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, on January 3, 1939, I introduced an amendment to the Social Security Act to provide for the payment of benefits to permanently and totally disabled individuals.

On March 7, 1939, I appeared before the House Ways and Means Committee requesting them to report my amendment favorably. I understand that the Social Security Board favors this amendment.

This morning's papers carried a story that Senator WAGNER, of New York, had introduced a similar bill in the Senate to provide for the payment of benefits to permanently and totally disabled persons who come under the Social Security Act, before they reach the age of 65. The papers quoted him as stating that such a provision should have been included in the original bill.

I would appreciate it very much if the Ways and Means Committee would make a favorable report on my amendment as I consider it very important to persons who would benefit by its enactment into law. [Applause.]

H. R. 42

A bill to amend the Social Security Act so as to provide for the payment of benefits to permanently and totally disabled individuals

Be it enacted, etc., That the title heading of title II of the Social Security Act is amended to read as follows:

"TITE II—FEDERAL OLD-AGE BENEFITS AND DISABILITY BENEFITS"

SEC. 2. Such title II is amended by adding after section 202 the following new section:

"DISABILITY BENEFITS

"SEC. 202½. (a) Every individual who becomes permanently and totally disabled shall be entitled to receive, with respect to the period beginning on the date he becomes so disabled and ending on the date of his death, a disability benefit (payable as nearly as practicable in equal monthly installments) equal to the old-age benefit he would have been entitled to receive under section 202 if he had attained the age of 65 on the date he became so disabled, but in no such case shall the monthly rate of payment be less than $60.

"(b) Whenever the Board finds that any individual has received wages with respect to regular employment after becoming permanently and totally disabled the payments to such individual under this section shall be reduced for each calendar month in any part of which such regular employment occurred by an amount equal to one month's payment. Such reduction shall be made under regulations prescribed by the Board by deductions from one or more payments to such individual provided for by this section.

"(c) Benefits payable pursuant to this action shall be in lieu of any old-age benefit that would be payable to the same individual with respect to the same period."

SEC. 3. (a) Section 203 of such title II is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 203. (a) If any individual dies before attaining the age of 65 and before any benefit becomes payable to such individual under section 202½, there shall be paid to his estate an amount equal to 3½ percent of the total wages determined by the Board to have been paid to him, with respect to employment after December 31, 1936.

"(b) If the Board finds that the correct amount of the benefits payable to an individual during his life under sections 202 and 202½ was less than 3½ percent of the total wages by which such benefits were measurable, then there shall be paid to his estate a sum equal to the amount, if any, by which such 3½ percent exceeds the amount (whether more or less than the correct amount) paid to him during his life under sections 202 and 202½.

"(c) If the Board finds that the total amount paid to an individual during his life under sections 202 and 202½ was less than the correct amount of the benefits to which he was entitled under such sections and that the correct amount of the benefits to which he was so entitled was 3½ percent or more of the total wages by which such benefits were measurable, then there shall be paid to his estate a sum equal to the amount, if any, by which the correct amount of the benefits payable to him under such sections exceeds the amount which was so paid to him during his life."

(b) Section 206 of such title II is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 206. If the Board finds that the total amount paid to an individual during his life under sections 202 and 202½ was more than the correct amount of the benefits to which he was entitled under such sections, and was 3½ percent or more of the total wages by which the benefits under such sections were measurable, then upon his death there shall be repaid to the United States by his estate the amount, if any, by which such total payment paid to him during his life exceeds whichever of the following is the greater: (1) Such 3½ percent, or (2) the correct amount to which he was entitled under sections 202 and 202½."

STATEMENT BY HON. JAMES M. FITZPATRICK, OF NEW YORK, BEFORE HOUSE WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE MARCH 7, 1939

Mr. Chairman, on January 3 I introduced a bill to amend the Social Security Act, which provides that if any working person who comes under the Social Security Act becomes totally and permanently disabled he will receive compensation beginning on the date of his disability, and in no case shall any person coming under this amendment receive less than $60 per month.

Under the Social Security Act at the present time a disabled worker cannot receive any compensation until he reaches the age of 65. In other words, if a married man 40 or 50 years of age becomes totally disabled he or his family does not receive any aid whatsoever under the provisions of the present act until he reaches the age of 65.

The President recommended that the act should be amended so as to take care of widows and orphans, with which I heartily agree. However, I think it is just as important, if not more so, that a man who becomes totally disabled should be provided for, especially where he has a wife and family.

There is nothing further that I can say on this question, as I feel confident that your committee fully realize the conditions where a person would be totally and permanently disabled, and under the present act could receive no pension until he reaches the age of 65.

Therefore, I ask your committee to accept my amendment, which I feel would be only justice to those workers who come under the act and who would become totally and permanently disabled before they reach the age of 65.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a short editorial from the Times-Herald of Washington.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. RABAUT]?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address by Mr. Harry C. Bates, of the A. F. of L. housing committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMASON]?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BUCKLER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, the Red Lake Band of Indians in Minnesota has $405,000 in the Treasury of the United States that they have laid up out of their timber funds. I have just received a letter this morning from one of my constituents in Minnesota stating that the Indian families up there are in desperate circumstances. He states that all they have had to eat in a great many cases is fish. He wants me to name somebody to go over the Indian reservation and verify what he says concerning these Indians.

I have a bill to provide a per capita payment of $12.50 to the Red Lake Indians. This bill came up on the floor yesterday. Although the money, only about $25,000, comes out of their own tribal funds, it was objected to by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT]. I cannot believe that the Congressman is acquainted with the sorry plight of these Indians, or he surely would not have objected to this small payment of their own money. I cannot understand why they should suffer when they have money on deposit with the Government.

My purpose in asking for this time is to acquaint the membership of the House concerning the situation of the Indians on the Red Lake Indian Reservation.

We collect money to feed the starving and hungry people in Europe, for which I certainly have no criticism. However, why should our own Americans, the Indians, be permitted to go hungry while they have money of their own in the United States Treasury?

I hope we can find some method to approve this small authorization of but $12.50 per enrolled Indian, and I hope some of the Members here might prevail on the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] to withdraw his objections. If not, I hope there is some other way to get this worthy measure approved by the House.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and to include therein an address I gave in the city of Chicago recently.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH]?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an article appearing in the Chicago Tribune of May 2, 1940.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. ELLIOTT]?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a brief editorial appearing in the Bloch newspapers on the Logan-Walter bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SPRINGER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record and to include therein a short letter and an excerpt from a newspaper on the W. P. A.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. ANGELL]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENDER asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. JENSEN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, the reorganization of the Civil Aeronautics Authority provides that budgetary and personnel functions must be performed under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce.

Faced with overwhelming criticism, the Budget Bureau now says that this will not prevent the Authority from appointing its own personnel.

Of course, it will not. But the Budget Bureau told only half the story. The C. A. A. can appoint its own personnel, but the power to do so will be subject to the direction and supervision of the Secretary of Commerce. Those are the very words of the reorganization plan, and the Budget Bureau does not deny it.

The way to keep the C. A. A. independent is to keep it out of the Department of Commerce. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I am more than satisfied that not a single Member of this body gives any serious credence to the statements and letters that the gentleman from Montana puts in the RECORD day after day. Nevertheless, I feel it my duty to give notice that tomorrow I shall ask that the RECORD of yesterday be corrected, in that——

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. No, I cannot; I have only a minute.

I now give notice that I shall tomorrow ask that yesterday's RECORD be corrected to show that after a point of order was made that there was no quorum and after adjournment was ordered the gentleman from Montana [Mr. THORKELSON] inserted about 31 typed pages of manuscript in the RECORD, which matters were not spoken of on the floor of the House.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question? What page does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. SABATH. Beginning at 5630.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, my point of order was that the words of the gentleman were out of order. They are a violation of the rules of the House. I ask that those words referring to alleged outrageously false statements that were being put into the RECORD by the gentleman from Montana be taken down.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the words to which the gentleman from Michigan objected.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Nothing is in order until the words have been reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

I am more than satisfied that there is not a single Member of this body that pays any attention to the inserts and the outrageously false statements and letters that the gentleman from Montana puts in the RECORD day in and day out.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, with a view to shortening the procedure, I am willing to withdraw the words "outrageously false," as I have given notice I shall take up the matter of correcting the RECORD in connection with the gentleman's remarks in the RECORD of yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to withdraw from the RECORD the words taken down, particularly the words "outrageously false statements," and so forth. Is there objection?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if the gentleman had made the statement that he would withdraw it, I would consent; but he said some other words, which I think he should now withdraw, with reference to substantiation. If he would withdraw those words, I would consent to it.

Mr. SABATH. All right; I withdraw it for the day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw the words.

Mr. SABATH. I withdraw them, Mr. Speaker.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

We have a very busy day, and a matter is coming up that I think all the Members of the House should be apprised of, and that is, first, the resolution of the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] with reference to the fourth reorganization order of the President. This being true, I shall object to any other unanimous-consent requests at the present time, and I make the point of order there is no quorum present, in order that all Members may be here.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order there is not a quorum present. The Chair is of the opinion there is not a quorum present.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 96]

Allen, Ill.	Arnold	Boehne	Byron
Allen, Pa.	Barden, N. C.	Bradley, Pa.	Clark
Andrews	Bates, Mass.	Byrne, N. Y.	Claypool

Coffee, Wash.	Horton	Merritt	Shafer, Mich.
Cole, Md.	Houston	Mitchell	Shannon
Corbett	Jarman	Myers	Sheridan
Crowe	Jenks, N. H.	Nelson	Smith, Ohio
Darrow	Johns	Norton	Smith, Va.
Dunn	Johnson, Lyndon	O'Brien	Starnes, Ala.
Durham	Jones, Ohio	Osmers	Steagall
Englebright	Kennedy, Md.	Patrick	Stearns, N. H.
Gilchrist	Kirwan	Peterson, Fla.	Sweeney
Gillie	Knutson	Randolph	Taylor
Grant, Ind.	Landis	Rogers, Okla.	Ward
Green	Lewis, Ohio	Sandager	Weaver
Harness	McGranery	Sasscer	Whelchel
Hendricks	Martin, Ill.	Schulte
Holmes	Mason	Seger

The SPEAKER. On this roll 360 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

By unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. IV, CIVIL AERONAUTICS AUTHORITY

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I move to discharge the Select Committee on Government Organization from further consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 60.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 60

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Congress does not favor the Reorganization Plan No. IV transmitted to Congress by the President on April 11, 1940.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, the majority members of the Select Committee on Organization are in accord with the gentleman from California, and I ask unanimous consent that the motion of the gentleman from California to discharge the select committee be considered as having been agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 60, and pending that I ask unanimous consent that debate on said concurrent resolution be limited to 3 hours, the time to be equally divided and controlled by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], and that the final vote on the concurrent resolution be taken on Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 60. Pending that he asks unanimous consent that debate be limited to 3 hours, the time to be equally controlled by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], and that the final vote be taken Wednesday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from California that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 60.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 60, with Mr. ROMJUE in the chair.

The Clerk again reported the resolution.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA].

Mr. LEA. Mr. Chairman, by the Reorganization Act passed last year Congress delegated to the President the right to reorganize and transfer numerous governmental agencies. Congress retained the right to disapprove of the orders of the President by a majority vote of each House within 60 days after an order of reorganization.

On the 11th of April the President made an order proposing to transfer to the Department of Commerce the Civil Aeronautics Authority, which for 2 years has had charge of governmental regulation and promotion of aircraft activities. The Presidential order proposed to place the Civil Aeronautics Authority within the framework of the Department of Commerce. It stated:

> I am bringing the Authority into the departmental structure. The Administrator will report to the Secretary of Commerce. The five-member Board, however, will perform its rule-making, adjudicative, and investigation functions independent of the Department. * * * that it will be supplied with budgeting, accounting, procurement, and other office services. * * *

The name of the Authority is to be changed, and it is to be designated as the Civil Aeronautics Board. It said the—> Board will be able effectively to carry forward the important work of accident investigation heretofore performed by the Air Safety Board.

The independent Safety Board is abolished.

The residuary or catch-all provision of the order states that, except as otherwise authorized, the function of the head of the agency transferred "shall be exercised by the head" of the agency to which the function is transferred.

The Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938 was the culmination of a fight to lift aviation out of its unfortunate Government setting and place it on a basis of efficient stabilized regulation. This result was accomplished after a 2-year fight against Government departmental interference, with legislative action by Congress. Each department concerned was determined on continuing its improvident control divided among several agencies of the Government. The fight for the Civil Aeronautics Act was to correct demonstrated evils in the administration of civil aviation.

The old set-up of aviation was a divided Authority—political domination, improvident regulation, constant changes, resulting in instability and an appalling record of fatal accidents to pilots and passengers.

All great air lines were in the red. Financing was drying up. We passed the Civil Aeronautics Act just in time to prevent several American air lines from folding up and passing out of the picture. In the last year $25,000,000 have been invested in commercial air equipment.

One major thing accomplished by the Civil Aeronautics Act, was to take various phases of aviation out of departmental control and place them within the regulation of an independent agency. Another great purpose was to establish an independent safety board to investigate accidents and promote air safety. The need of an independent group for this purpose was demonstrated beyond question. The lack of it was a fatal mistake in the old set-up. A fundamental purpose was to destroy a system of self-investigation under which the agencies in control were in a position to whitewash accidents for which they might be responsible. In other words we transferred the function from a self-investigation agency to one of independent action. It could fearlessly investigate where the Authority itself might be responsible for neglects, or regulations, against safety. The members of the Safety Board were placed in position to fix responsibility without the danger of losing their own jobs.

Under the set-up of this act aviation was lifted out of the doldrums, and has written the brightest record of accomplishment that the world has so far known in civil aviation. That record is the most unquestioned achievement of any agency of the Government established during the last 7 years.

The American people are a sensible people. They are going to judge this agency by results. They are not going to drop the bone for the shadow in the river.

The bureau system of administration is necessary in executive affairs of the Government, but that system has no rightful place in the regulatory agencies that should be independent. The bureau set-up is pretty much a buck-passing form of organization with responsible irresponsibility in unseen control.

A subordinate status under a system of bureau operation does not fit into our great regulatory agencies, such as the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Trade, the Federal Power, the Federal Communications, and the Securities and Exchange Commissions. Proper administration of these Commissions require men of ability, courage, fairness, intelligence, and freedom from political influences. It is hopeless to expect them to function properly if they are to be handicapped by dominating influences, less familiar and less interested in the success of their work.

The proposed plan of reorganization tends to mutilate the Civil Aeronautics Authority. From an important independent agency, it is to become a board under a political organization of the Government.

The agencies created by Congress to perform quasi-legislative and quasi-judicial functions should be independent of the executive department. They should not be under a control that lacks understanding or sympathy or under the control of those who have many other duties, unrelated to such agency.

The Safety Board, with its independent investigative authority, is to be abolished, and the Board given authority to investigate the mistakes for which it may be responsible. The self-investigating system is to be restored.

Here we have a question of fundamental policy as to the status of our important regulatory agencies. This reorganization would make an innovation that might easily develop into a very unfortunate national policy. It would be our first destruction of the independence of an important regulatory agency. Once make these agencies subservient to administrative and politically controlled departments of government, and that subservience will grow like creeping paralysis. All or none of the independent agencies should be treated alike. All should remain independent, or all should, alike, be made subservient to the executive departments.

Do not start on this course unless you are willing to go the whole way.

The questions involved are not ones of personality or temporary expediency or of the men who may happen to be in temporary administrative control, but it is the great question of providing this vital aviation industry, which has such an important relation to the future of our country, with an efficient and stabilized basis of regulation.

I raise no question about the good intentions involved in this proposed change. When the history of aviation in this country finally shall have been written, it must contain four or five chapters covering long periods showing the dark side of the picture due to the well-intentioned but improvident attitude of governmental authorities. Out of the experience of the past we should avoid repetition of mistakes.

The advocates of this transfer are driven to the exigencies of trying to belittle this organization because of those natural difficulties that a new organization develops before it can reach a smooth-running status. Trivial incidents are to be magnified in attempt to justify this transfer. Somebody had a quarrel, some W. P. A. budget funds were used to help air fields, therefore transfer of the agency. Human frailty can never be eliminated from any of our enterprises.

I am satisfied that the reasons asserted for the change are theoretical, inconsequential, and ignore the important problems with which aviation deals.

Transfer this responsibility to a new agency and you repeat the necessity of readjusting by experiences to the new set-up.

The reorganization order, in my judgment, violates the first principles of practical reorganization. The motive to justify reorganization should be to correct established mistakes and improve the service. The order reducing this type of agency to a bureau in an executive department promises little of improvement and menaces the morale of the regulatory body, of the pilots who operate the planes, and discourages the financing of air lines. The instability resulting from the change creates apprehension in the minds of the friends of aviation everywhere.

The limited group of air pilots, before regulation was taken over by the Civil Aeronautics Authority, contributed 146 lives of their limited number to air navigation. The remarkable safety record under the new set-up is an inspiration to them. Any threat of impairment by return to the old conditions distresses them. The Civil Aeronautics Authority had to assemble the personnel of its large group and go through the grief that accompanies an inexperienced organization in its initial stages. It has gone through this initial period with remarkable success. It can function with the advantage of experience and a smooth-running organization. In actual practice it has established its right to continue its work and to receive the acclaim of the American people.

Civil aviation needs stability of policy and continuity in administration of its affairs. Executive departments are under centralized control with one man above another until finally the chain of authority reaches the President of the United States. All the way up the line the idiosyncracies, policies, and frailties of the individuals are reflected in the information that reaches the President. In that line of authority is concealed the influences that frequently dominate administrative organizations.

Under the Civil Aeronautics Authority we know who is doing the job, who is responsible.

Past experiences tend to demonstrate the failure of the plan here proposed.

Under the original set-up of the Interstate Commerce Commission the appointment and compensation of its employees were made subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. It was further provided that the Secretary should supply the Commission with offices and facilities, and that its reports should be made to the Secretary of the Interior.

After some practical experience in this intermixing of the Commission with the Department, the Secretary of the Interior found that the control given him was unworkable and undesirable. In his annual report of 1888 he described this control as "invidious and irksome." He stated he could not perform the duties assigned to him as satisfactorily as an independent commission, and that his duty was "disparaging of the character of the Commission."

Who can for one moment distrust the wisdom of the Secretary of the Interior under those circumstances? How can a great important regulatory agency of the Government, with a fine record of success, lose its independent identity, be merged in a political department of the Government, be required to make its report to that department, and have its budgeting, accounting, procurement of supplies, and other office services performed by that department without the disparagement of its character as an independent commission of the Government?

After this experience and wise advice from the Secretary of the Interior, Congress in 1889 made the Interstate Commerce Commission completely independent, and under that independence it has established its reputation as a great and respected regulatory agency of the Federal Government. It has attained its place by having the opportunity to work independently, thoroughly, and with judicial fairness, without political domination.

In a study of independent agencies made for the Brownwell Committee on Administrative Management, it was said:

> To put a commission in a department that has nothing to do with its work would obstruct rather than aid effective over-all management. The Commission would suffer from the type of neglect that springs from indifference or neglect. It would be merely a cog in a big machine.

Congress must accept responsibility for what is done in this matter. I believe it is its duty to now exercise the authority that it properly reserved to itself of disapproving the Executive order which would make possible this backward step in the regulation of air commerce.

Civil aviation is the foundation on which military defense by air must largely rest. At this critical time of the history of the world we cannot afford to experiment with an agency whose efficiency is demonstrated beyond all reasonable doubt.

This problem rises above the question of mere politics. Partisan appeals on one side of the aisle or the other may be made here today. The highest approval we can hope to have is the confidence of the American people that when a serious question like this arises, whether or not it has political angles,

Congress can be trusted to do the right thing for the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] as he desires.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Chairman, I had intended to take no part in this debate other than to vote to sustain the President's order. I have been engrossed for weeks in other matters having my deepest interest. I knew nothing about Reorganization Order No. IV until it was read here in the House, and, of course, I do not mean to infer that I should have had any prior knowledge of it. On account of the misleading propaganda that has been put out in the last 3 or more weeks, I have been appealed to in the last 2 days by a considerable number of Members to look into this order, and I have been impressed that it is my duty as a member of the House committee to not only make such investigation but to submit my views to this body for whatever they may be worth. I regret that the program as arranged by the majority leader has been disturbed, and while any Member is well within his rights to call up this rejection resolution today, since it originated in the Senate 4 weeks ago, and since that body is to act on it this week, we could have well waited for that decision.

We have heard a great deal lately about "Trojan horses." Well, one has been led to the battlements of the majority party here today by the only Democrat in the House who saw fit to introduce a rejection resolution.

When the horse disgorged there outpoured a flock of Republicans headed by the distinguished minority leader and my friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

I never handle the President's name to suit my own purpose. I delight to be with him when I can and in most instances my feeble efforts have been used to battle in his behalf. So today we find the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] leading the Republican hosts in their efforts to discredit the President. Just a little later in the week we will find him with tears in his eyes as big as horse apples, citing the President in an effort to put over a piece of legislation inimical to the public welfare.

From the study I have made of this matter I am sincerely convinced that a phony issue is raised here today. Now, what are the facts and what are the issues?

Reorganization Order No. III, about which nothing has been said, merely coordinated the authority of the Administrator. Reorganization Order No. IV, which you are now asked to reject, abolishes the Air Safety Board, but transfers all of its authority and functions to the Civil Aeronautics Authority, and in addition to that it places the Civil Aeronautics Authority under a department head. It is needless for me to call your attention to the fact that time after time in all of the debates on the reorganization bill, and especially on the one which we passed at this session of Congress, attempt after attempt was made to exempt from all reorganization the Civil Aeronautics Authority, and in every instance in each House that exemption was denied.

My friend the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] will discuss that phase. I will confine myself to that part of the plan which proposes to transfer the functions of the Air Safety Board to the five-man Civil Aeronautics Board.

As you know, it will also abolish the $7,500 jobs of two men, the present members of the Air Safety Board.

The air-line industry has not, to my knowledge, opposed the transfer of the Air Safety Board's functions to the five-man board. I am told it is in favor of the plan.

The airplane manufacturers have not, to my knowledge, raised their voice against this transfer. I am told they favor the transfer.

The Civil Aeronautics Authority has not objected to this transfer. I am told they favor the plan. Why?

The only persons, to my knowledge, who are opposed are members of an organization which numbers only 150 persons, the Air Line Pilots Association. The only other persons who object are two men whose names are Hardin and Allen. Their jobs will be abolished. They are the present members of the Air Safety Board.

Hardin was, until his appointment, vice president of the Air Line Pilots. Robert H. Hinckley, Chairman of the present five-man Civil Aeronautics Authority, and Clinton M. Hester, Administrator of the Civil Aeronautics Authority, have on numerous occasions expressed their dissatisfaction with their relationships with the Air Safety Board. I propose to tell you why.

The Air Safety Board since its creation has been one of the rottenest and one of the worst administered messes in the Government for many years. Let me give you some background.

The Air Safety Board is only one part of the three-headed agency now known as the Civil Aeronautics Authority. There is a five-man Board known as the Authority, an Administrator and the Air Safety Board. Each is completely separate from the other. They are really three independent agencies.

In August 1938 the President appointed to the Air Safety Board Col. Sumpter Smith, who was at the time head of the airport construction for W. P. A. He also appointed Tom Hardin, who at that time was vice president of the Air Line Pilots, an organization which is the only group in the country actively opposing transfer of the Board's functions. Colonel Smith was elected chairman. The third man, C. B. Allen, was not appointed until later. Allen's background is interesting. He is aviation reporter of the arch-Republican newspaper, the New York Herald Tribune, and at present he is on leave of absence from that paper.

From the beginning a bitter quarrel marked the conduct of this governmental agency. It started between Smith and Hardin. When Allen joined Hardin to form a majority, the bitterness increased. This ill feeling, which was common knowledge to every informed person in the executive branch of the Government, finally reached a climax when Hardin and Allen deposed Smith as chairman of the Board and elected Hardin.

Now, I have not studied this particular branch of administrative law, so I am not prepared to say that this action is as grossly illegal as certain lawyers have charged, but I do know that Smith had been properly elected chairman for a term of 1 year, and when he was deposed by his associates, that year had not run its course. At any rate, this brought the matter to a head. The problem was laid before the President of the United States. Discussions and conversations were held at great length by the Administrator with the three members of the Board. This entire background of personal bitterness and practically public quarreling, which, according to the statements of the three men, had resulted in the complete demoralization of the entire staff of the Board, was carefully canvassed. In the past few weeks some men have said that Reorganization Plan No. IV was a purely capricious gesture by the President. I have not yet stated the date of these occurrences that I have mentioned. It was in late August 1939, 9 months ago. Hardin, Allen, and Smith admitted they could agree on only one thing. The situation was so bad, they said, that the Board itself was helpless.

It could not solve the problem. The three men felt that only action by the President of the United States could help them out of these difficulties. They stated frankly they could no longer cope with the situation.

A few months before Colonel Smith, at the request of the leading experts in the country, had also taken over the duty of supervising the construction of Gravelly Point Airport. This he did in his spare time. Gravelly Point, however, was reaching the stage when it would become a full-time job. Sumpter Smith was the obvious man to carry it on. Because of this, and to remove the personal bitterness within the Board, it was proposed that Smith be appointed to the position of engineer in charge of the completion of Gravelly Point Airport—which, incidentally, will be the greatest airport in the world.

Nonetheless, it was perfectly apparent this was no solution. Something had caused these quarrels. There were flaws, whether administrative or in the statute, or both, which had crippled the efficiency of the Air Safety Board. The charges and countercharges which the three members made against each other were ostensibly, at least, based on the organizational defects within the agency. It was clear that a painstaking study of the Board's operations was necessary.

At about approximately the same period the administration was disturbed by complaints that the Air Safety Board persistently refused to confine itself to its own jurisdiction, as outlined by the statute. It was charged that Hardin and Allen were deliberately trying to set up a huge organization to do research of the kind which had nothing to do with the investigation of accidents—which, mind you, is the sole and only function of the Board. If they were successful in this attempt, Hardin and Allen would duplicate the already-existing research staff in the Bureau of Safety Regulation of the C. A. A., which, under the statute, was charged with this type of research.

It was claimed that the Board insisted on buying a large number of airplanes to fly all over the country; that it used Government funds to purchase more planes than the C. A. A., with a much larger staff, had for its use. I am told that these planes were in so little use that the Board had to lend them to the ill-equipped Authority.

It was perfectly clear to everyone there was something "rotten in Denmark." Not only was there friction within the Board itself, but it was rapidly spreading trouble to the entire Civil Aeronautics Authority. The problem was not only serious; it was complex. Clearly, an impartial investigation to sift these matters was necessary.

The administration requested the Administrative Management Division of the Budget Bureau to conduct such a study. This request was made in October 1939, and for the next 5 months the Budget Bureau studied the internal management of the Air Safety Board and its relations with the Authority and with the Administrator.

For the past 9 months, therefore, the Air Safety Board has been a constant problem to the executive branch of the Government. The recommendations finally reached by the Budget Bureau were embodied in the reorganization plans which the President has sent to the Congress.

I do not intend to discuss the reasons which the Budget Bureau has advanced for this plan. The gentleman from Missouri, Congressman COCHRAN, has presented these arguments. There are a few things about the Air Safety Board I should like to emphasize.

How efficient is this Board we have been hearing so much about? Its only function is to investigate accidents. Obviously it cannot do so until after they have occurred. It then reports publicly to the Authority and makes its recommendations. Since it can do nothing until after an accident, how can it claim credit for the year which has just passed without a fatal accident on an scheduled air line?

Are the air-line operators and pilots who are actually in charge day and night to be given no credit at all? I suppose we are to ignore the fact that they voluntarily agreed last year to cancel mutually competitive flights at the first sign of bad weather. Is the five-man Authority which promulgates the safety rules and issues the safety certificates to be given no credit? Is the Administrator who is responsible for the air-navigation facilities to be given no credit?

Does the public really understand the fact that the Air Safety Board is only one small part—the smallest part—of the Civil Aeronautics Authority?

But if the Air Safety Board insists on taking every bit of credit for this record year, why does it not emphasize the fact that under its perfect supervision during the year 340 persons have been killed in nonscheduled private airplane accidents?

Gentlemen, let us place the credit where it is due. I repeat, the only function the Board has is to report to and make recommendations for future action to the Civil Aeronautics Authority. If these reports are to be effective, they must be made just as soon as possible after the accident. Thus a similar accident may be prevented in the future.

However, such reports may reach the Authority over a year after the accident has occurred.

I have quoted verbatim that last sentence from a pamphlet issued by the Civil Aeronautics Authority. The C. A. A. points out that because of the usual delays of the Air Safety Board the Authority is forced to rely on its own personnel to furnish it with speedier action if it is to prevent similar accidents in the future.

It may take "over a year." The average time for reports to reach the Authority is 5 months. How can such delays prevent accidents? The Authority cannot wait—it must itself inspect all accidents with its own admirable facilities so it can reshape its rules and revoke safety certificates where necessary.

According to the annual report of the Air Safety Board, the Board reported to the Authority only a little more than 1,000 of the 2,700 accidents it dealt with. During the first 6 months of its existence no reports were made because the two members at the time were unable to agree on any of them.

Why this record of delay by the Air Safety Board? Its members have been so constantly embroiled with each other in bitter personal quarrels they had no time to perform the work delegated to them by the statute.

The argument that they were not granted sufficient funds to carry on their duties is not satisfactory. The Authority itself thoroughly investigated these accidents efficiently and speedily, using its field personnel, which also performs countless other duties. Is it argued that the Congress shall appropriate funds so the Board will duplicate an already existing staff performing many other functions? Or shall we save money and let the Authority formally take over the job it now is forced to do, if it is to be done right?

The disagreement between the members spread to and eventually disorganized the entire staff of the Board. Employees who dared to disagree with Hardin and Allen were eventually fired. If they had the temerity to side with Smith, the then chairman of the Board, their dismissal was practically automatic. Here is one example of such high-handedness:

The then chief counsel of the Air Safety Board, Mr. Darrell Lane, protested in a legal memorandum against the legal procedure of the Air Safety Board in handling a particular accident report. In the particular case Lane took occasion to compare the procedure of the Air Safety Board with the excellent methods of the five-man Authority in handling the identical accident.

Hardin and Allen had before them no legal memorandum disputing the points raised by Lane. Despite the fact that they were thus unable to criticize his legal conclusions, they demanded his resignation. At their insistent request, Lane resigned.

Their technique in removing personnel who disagreed with them was to abolish their jobs by a reorganization. When they reorganized it was Smith's friends whose jobs were abolished. In fact, the main quarrel, according to the three members, took place over a reorganization scheme which Hardin and Allen adopted and which Smith pronounced unworkable. Despite Smith's complaints they reorganized the three existing divisions of the Board into one division with three sections. They then set up an executive officer as the administrator of the Board. In arguing for the need of reorganization they insisted the Board had been falling further behind in completing its accident reports because of the old system. Smith claimed it created more delays. It is small wonder the administration put Government experts to work.

At one stage the fight became so bitter that the demoralized staff was treated to the absurd spectacle of two of its superiors refusing to allow the other to read the official transcript taken down of the Board meetings. Its minutes were made from these transcripts.

Hardin and Allen insisted that secret signals were arranged with the stenographer to take down off-the-record conversations, and that therefore the transcript should not be made available to the Chairman. This story, admitted in full by the participants, ought to prove illuminating to the House of Representatives. It graphically illustrates the degree to which Government conduct of business can fall. I personally wonder what these off-the-record conversations could have been if they were so important and so confidential they could not safely be incorporated into the minutes.

This, then, has been the conduct of the Air Safety Board. It presents the pretty picture of a Board divided into two warring camps, two general staffs, each with their own camp followers. They spent Government money and Government time warring against each other while the business of government fell further and further behind. The camp followers who picked the wrong general were eventually dismissed. They committed the sin of betting on the wrong horse.

Does the House believe that the administration should have sat idly by with a situation like this? Should the responsible head of the executive branch pretend to ignore the obvious while Government funds were wasted? Here a Government agency had broken down. The main reason advanced was a question of organization. If this were really so, the natural thing for the administration to do was to send in its Government experts to dig out the trouble.

Can anyone quarrel with this procedure? It has tried and is trying to clean up a mess. The result of its study of the Board is in this reorganization plan.

I have heard no Member opposed to the plan attack the record of the five-man Authority. Instead, they have been high with their praise. If the Members of this House are so satisfied with the record of the five-man Authority, how can they object to transferring the functions of the Air Safety Board to such an efficient organization, at the same time abolishing the positions of the two men responsible for the failure of the Board?

I wonder if the House is under the illusion the Air Safety Board has been functioning in our Government's behalf since this reorganization plan was announced. Are they aware that Chairman Hardin flew at Government expense and on Government time to a meeting in Oklahoma, there to make a speech in which he, a Presidential appointee, expressed the hope that the Air Safety Board would be continued despite the President's wishes to the contrary?

Is the House aware that Hardin and Allen recently prepared a widely distributed pamphlet printed at Government expense, by Government employees on Government time, which attacks this reorganization plan?

Last fall they were too involved in bitter personal quarrels to keep abreast of the work required by the statute. Today they seem to have sufficient time to spend their efforts in such extracurricular activities.

Now let us go into some of these things. We all know there were violent disagreements. Several months ago there was an investigation of the accident at Bolling Field in which the brilliant and well-known Mexican pilot, Serabia, lost his life. The Department of State can doubtless throw a lot of light on that dispute with the Air Safety Board.

There was another controversy which must be touched on. It involved the procurement of two airplanes from the Navy and their subsequent trade to Bellanca for two small untried airplanes of doubtful utility. The reason for this trading away of the Navy planes was that neither member of the Board, Mr. Hardin or Mr. Allen, was competent to fly them, and on that account would not allow members of their staff to fly them although naval cadets are trained on these airplanes.

The negotiation with Bellanca was entered into and the terms of the trade agreed upon before specifications were written and proposals issued. The specifications were restricted, the Bellanca plane being the only plane able to meet the specifications. Before Bellanca made the deal with the first airplane Bellanca arranged a tentative sale of the Navy airplanes to a stunt pilot formerly living in Fort Worth, Tex., Mr. Hardin's home town. The incompetency of Mr. Allen to fly this Navy plane, which is of the same type as cadets for the Navy are trained on, was demonstrated on his only flight when he nearly crashed into a group of Army bombers parked on Bolling Field. This record could be amplified no doubt by officers of the Army Air Corps who were present at Bolling Field when Mr. Allen unsuccessfully attempted to fly the plane. Navy officials will testify that they are training successful flying cadets on the same type of plane.

The competency of Mr. Hardin leaves much to be desired. He took off from Washington in a Boeing transport plane belonging to the Air Safety Board for a trip to Nashville, Tenn. The weather was good; the trip was made in broad daylight, and although Mr. Hardin should be thoroughly familiar with this route, inasmuch as he had flown it many times for American air lines, he became hopelessly lost and finally landed in a cow pasture in Indiana, and asked the farmer for God's sake to tell him where he was.

The law requires that one member of the Board be an experienced air-line pilot with 3,000 flying hours to his credit. Hardin is supposed to be this man.

Here is another thing, Mr. Chairman, and I ask you to follow this:

Since April 11 the entire Washington staff of the Safety Board has been required to spend its entire time preparing material apparently used in the propaganda distributed by the officials and hired agents of the Pilots Union. These statistics are juggled to fit the purpose. They were gotten up to show the decrease in air-line accidents subsequent to the inauguration of the Air Safety Board. The intent apparently was to prove that the sharp decline in accidents could be attributed to the influence of the Safety Board. Much to the surprise of the members of the Board these statistics, when plotted in graph form, showed definitely that the decline in accidents started more than a year before the Safety Board came into being, and that the so-called year of no accidents was merely the tail end of this nonaccident trend. The graph which was to be used in this fight against the President's order was thereupon destroyed. The statistics were then released without a graph.

And they come before you with a misnomer styled "A lobby to save lives!" Here and now I should like to say that the Civil Aeronautics Authority and the Civil Aeronautics Administrator have made far greater contributions to safety than has ever been made by the Air Safety Board. Who made the airways safe? Any contention that safety in the air is primarily dependent on a Board primarily set up to investigate accidents is a travesty on the splendid loyalty and efficiency of every air pilot, every aviation mechanic, every weather observer, every dispatcher, every aeronautical engineer and every employee in the aviation industry, who is doing his job day in and day out and thus making his contribution to air safety. Safety is the product of a multitude of jobs well done, and I should like to point out that neither the Army, nor the Navy, nor the United States Coast Guard have found it necessary to set up safety boards to obtain a splendid operating record. Of course, these services investigate accidents, and, of course, they take measures to prevent them, and, of course, they obtain knowledge and experience from every investigation of an accident. From these and other agencies the President has learned how to correct the mistakes which were inherent in the law creating and misnaming the Air Safety Board, and which were accentuated by an unfortunate selection of Board members.

Mr. Chairman, I feel personally the deepest interest in everything pertaining to aviation. It all started down in my district just 37 years ago when at Kill Devil Hill the Wright brothers made the first successful flight. All of us are vitally interested in maintaining this new American institution, in which every American has a right to take greatest pride—the institution of safety in air transport. Let us not forget, however, that "every human institution is the lengthened shadow of a man," not of a Board. Let us not forget that every American who flies, or services, or helps to equip an airplane is an essential part of this new American institution and deserves a share in the credit for the world record which has been made for safety in air transport. Nothing could be more disastrous at this critical juncture in the world's history than to tempt the thousands of young Americans who are in training in civilian and aeronautical schools to believe that safety in the air depends not upon the thoroughness with which they train themselves, but upon a Board in Washington which has never yet been able to agree upon the facts found in connection with the investigation of accidents in the air.

I say to this committee today, Mr. Chairman, from all of the investigations that I have made in this matter that the President is eternally right to clean up the sorry mess down there. This order is the way to do it. It will be the greatest thing for aviation if his order placing them under a responsible Cabinet head with a seat at the council table of the President, is sustained, as it ought to be by this House. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I shall try to restrain myself as to politics in this matter. I regret that the first words of the last speaker were to the effect that the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] was leading the Republicans today. That has invited some pretty tart rejoinders, but I will refrain.

This is a matter for the majority of the House to determine. We have a great responsibility. We are dealing with safety measures involving the lives of our citizens. The last speaker said it was illuminating that the two members of the Air Safety Board had devoted Government time and expense to furnish us with a little information. From whom are we to get information except from those whose positions are jeopardized and may be willing to talk? It was all right for him to stand here for some 50 minutes or more and read to you—and he read it well, did he not?—about all the dirty linen that has been washed in this Board. Well, who gave him that information? Was that done on Government time and expense? Was it furnished to bolster his argument? This is not a case of washing dirty linen. Let that argument fall of its own weight. If the Air Safety Board could not be disciplined at the time they were disagreeing among themselves, is it possible that a whole reorganization scheme must be undertaken? Shall we go back to that discredited agency, take away their power, and place them under a politically minded gentleman? Our truly patriotic Democrats cannot agree to that.

Why should the minority talk at all? Why should I not keep my seat? I have been on this committee for a long time and am more interested in the principles involved in the reorganization schemes than I am in the details. We all should be. We are in no position to argue about details. No hearings are ever held on these reorganization measures. You take them or leave them. There is no chance whatever to argue or prove whether they be good or bad. The general legislative procedure is that when legislation is enacted, both branches of the Congress must act, take it to conference, and finally bring out a measure fully understood. In this case a recommendation takes effect unless both branches disagree to it. If the great majority of one branch agree and the other branch disagrees, it takes effect just the same. It is a most peculiar rule, is it not? It may be a good rule in some of its provisions. Anyone can bring it up. Both branches tied themselves up with a rule providing that we could act, but its weakness is that if one House agrees and the other disagrees, it goes into effect just the same, which is far from a proper or orderly method.

Mr. Chairman, I have only 15 minutes. I have read a good deal about this subject. This is no time to wash dirty linen and I have not been given it to read. We should forget that line of argument. The administration should have washed that linen clean. Consider the appeasement process of appointing Mr. Hinckley, as Assistant Secretary of Commerce, under Mr. Hopkins. This seems to have satisfied him. It does not appease an interested and anxious public. We are not quite sure who the Administrator may be, but I wish to present this thought.

All the way through these reorganization schemes is the intent of the Executive to get control of all administrative powers, the personnel, the Budget, the procurement, even the type of goods and needed devices. When they get that, the money, the personnel, the administration—and in this case they will appoint an administrator with the powers set forth under Reorganization No. III and leave this Board only the power to adjudicate—then what is left? Adjudicate what? What the Administrator sees fit to give the Board to adjudicate. They can make rules ad infinitum, but when you take the administering features from this present independent organization, the damage is done. We heretofore determined it should be independent after previous unhappy experiences. When we tried to exempt it with the other 21 exemptions that were made, we failed only by a slight margin. It should have been exempted with those other agencies, preventing this questionable operation.

Why could not the Executive have settled those differences between the two men after the other had resigned, without having to take this extreme measure? You have heard the immediate response from the interested public. The previous speaker said that certain organizations and people were favorable. Perhaps a small minority are. Why do we have to sit here and be entertained with a lot of that dirty-linen stuff, which somebody prepared, to distract our attention? Is that to be persuasive? Because certain people had quarrels, and the courage to get rid of them was lacking, should we have a reorganization of the whole activity imposed upon us. Shall we indulge this madness?

I am sorry if I say one word offensive to my Democratic friends, but the minority must needs help in this matter. You gentlemen cannot say some things which the minority may say, perhaps with some hesitation, but of which you really approve. You naturally wish not to be too critical of your own administration, and the minority should speak for you.

I read with great care every word, every syllable of the speech made over the air by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] justifying this plan. He stated the President is within his right, that this was not exempted, as were the 21 other agencies. That is true. He says the President's family travels by air, and therefore they are interested in safety. That is not an argument worthy of the gentleman. There were some statements by the previous speaker about Kitty Hawk, N. C., where the first flight was made. That may be persuasive, but it is only oratory, and I am not indulging in that procedure. I should be easily swayed if I were to let that sort of argument affect me in this important decision. The President's family travels by air. Yes; nearly all the time, by some method of transportation.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Did the gentleman from Missouri also indicate that the President's immediate family sells a great deal of aviation insurance, and that the picture of a member of the President's family, the First Lady, appeared in a recent two full-page Saturday Evening Post aviation advertisement?

Mr. GIFFORD. I hope the gentleman will not arouse me to talk on that subject. I may talk about it some other time. It would be a most enjoyable subject. The previous speaker said there was practically no opposition to the other recommendations. What chance did we have for opposition? No hearings were held, and no employees dared speak up and inform us regarding them. Of course, there was little opposition. I have read recently the debates of the last 2 years relating to these matters.

The leader of this House took the floor on the reorganization scheme in 1938 and practically warned with great emotion, "The Republicans will get you if you don't watch out." He just simply forced you to it by a plea of loyalty to the party. It was not the minority that brought politics into it, it was Democratic leaders that did so continually. There was the same cry in 1939, and today we hear it again.

"Does not abolish functions." Of course not. What good are functions if you appoint administrators who will not carry out functions? Give the power of appointment and control of the personnel to them and functions might disappear.

"Board retains its independence." Ridiculous—with a politician at the head who will give them such personnel as he desires. There would be perfect control of the Administrator, who will investigate what his superiors may see fit. Independence retained? Let us not be so deceived. Would you like to be on a board where all the administrative features were controlled by someone else? You could have no money, you could appoint nobody, you could procure nothing you thought desirable unless it was approved by someone higher up. Do you call that independence? Let not our intelligence be trifled with in such fashion.

"Two sets of investigators." They did have two sets. Yet there are a thousand cases still to be investigated. Perhaps they needed two sets of investigators. If you have this new Board with an Administrator with somebody over him, they will investigate just what he pleases and only what he pleases, and I suspect that most of these pending investigations may be dropped so they can say they are up to date.

"Defeat of this plan will be a set-back for civil aviation." The public does not believe that, and your mail does not indicate it. This is only a method to get complete control, administratively, at least, of this independent organization and change it from what Congress meant it to be. It is in line with the Brownlow scheme from the beginning—the Brownlow scheme which aroused the whole Nation to expostulate. How simple, thinks the Executive, "Let us get control of the personnel, the pay of the personnel, the Budget, and then we have all the control we need." I might say, if I wanted to use picturesque language, "functions be damned. They will function only as I desire if I control the men who are supposed to function." Can we not keep that in mind? That is the scheme back of all these plans.

There are many other changes in this reorganization plan, but no one seems to be interested in or informed about them. All arguments seem to center on the C. A. A. We have had no hearings on this suggestion. I must object, even though I am in the minority, to passing any reorganization plan without having any hearings or some proof offered us except during a few minutes of debate on the floor. We have listened for nearly an hour to dirty linen being washed. It might have been interesting and led to some emotional thinking. But did it have any weight? I trust not.

They could have handled it differently. If there is trouble among your servants, what do you do? Build a new house? Why not discharge them rather than build a new house as the only method of ridding yourself of them?

Referring to other provisions in this plan. I should like to know why they want to hand Madam Perkins more extraordinary power as suggested here. Is it wise? We do not know. The nautical schools are to be taken away from the Navy and put into the Maritime Commission. Is there one here sufficiently informed as to why the nautical schools should be taken from the Navy? The Maritime Commission may not endure long as a commission. They would take away from the boys in the nautical schools that which has been inculcated in them, the love of the Navy, the preparedness for defense of their country.

I speak of these things because the whole scheme ought to be investigated. Any reorganization scheme should be carefully considered, at least by the committee having the duty of studying the matter, with the public being given an opportunity of expression.

My time is exhausted, although I have a voluminous amount of suggestions here that might be presented. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. SHEPPARD].

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, we have listened to a rather interesting discussion pertaining to the proposal we have before us today. While I have the utmost regard for the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] who preceded me on the floor of the House, the records I have been able to compile do not jibe with the statements of the gentleman by a long shot.

I feel that we are called upon today to consider a proposal that goes far beyond any political ramifications. We are now faced with a condition where we are called upon to consider what is going to happen to humanity that may choose to use our modern-day transportation, to wit, aviation, as its method of travel. I believe we have something before us that merits intense consideration. I am not concerned with any interdepartmental fight that may have occurred. I will say, however, that my experience as a Member of this House would indicate to me that if there has been such a terrific turmoil in the air-safety department as our friend the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] has indicated, it is rather peculiar that more Members of this House have not heard of that disturbance. I, for one, have not heard anything about any misunderstandings that have been going on in these departments which, in any manner, were impeding the orderly process of the respective departments concerned with the control of aviation.

We heard the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] quoting that some gentleman had been removed from office down there.

I am just wondering if we were to scrutinize this picture carefully if, possibly, we would not find that one of the gentlemen who had lost his job was not on the investigating committee that made these recommendations to our President. This is something for you to think over at least. [Applause.]

Another thing I would like to call your attention to is this. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] referred very definitely to the tremendous expenditure that had taken place in the safety department. Well, Mr. Chairman, my information is to the effect that out of $380,000 for the fiscal year they anticipated turning back to the Treasury between $50,000 and $75,000, and yet they have been called upon to do a tremendous amount of work, much of it from the old Commerce Department.

You know it is rather startling that in some of the proposals that we have listened to we find that the proposal incorporates the idea that a body of gentlemen be transferred to a specific department and that they also take over, if you please, the supervision of safety when they themselves are the persons who designate the appliances to be used; in other words, if these splendid gentlemen in the Authority—and I have no quarrel with them as individuals or collectively—are put into the set-up that is proposed by this reorganization, then what do we find? We find that they are the gentlemen who will pass upon the blue prints of planes to be put into modern transportation as being acceptable, and then, if they crack up, the same group of gentlemen pass upon their own inability to have functioned properly in the first instance. You know we may have men in these departments who are constituted quite differently from you and me as Members of Congress, but I have never yet found any particular situation where that great element of the human equation was not a material factor, and I want to make this statement to you. Both my wife and I love to fly commercially and in private planes. We were among the first, if you please, to go up in the "wingless bug" commonly known as the gyro down here because we wanted to see what made the wheels turn around in aviation; but under the circumstances of the reorganization plan as proposed today——

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not want to jeopardize my life or the lives of my family due to the attitude of gentlemen who might be called upon to pass upon their own mistakes; and I may say this to you: The record that has been made by the Safety Board is a most enviable one, and I shall ask at the proper time unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a table of mileage flown under the direction of the Department of Commerce and the number flown for the last 20 months under the present Safety Board; and read this table and reach your own conclusions as to how you should vote on this issue. [Applause.]

Scheduled domestic air-carrier operation

Last 20 months under Department of Commerce:

Passengers carried	1,852,902
Miles flown	109,793,440
Passenger miles	816,810,297
Fatal accidents	9
Fatalities:
Crew	21
Passengers	62
Total	83

Average death rate, 1 every 7.2 days.

Last 20 months under Air Safety Board:

Passengers carried	3,071,671
Miles flown	134,775,977
Passenger miles	1,213,299,969
Fatal accidents	3
Fatalities:
Crew	4
Passengers	12
Total	16

Average death rate, 1 every 37 days.

NOTE.—The average death rate during the last 20 months of operation under the Department of Commerce was more than 5 times greater than that after the Air Safety Board assumed office, a net increase in safety of more than 400 percent. During the last 16 months of the 20 months' operation under the Air Safety Board there was not a single pilot fatality. In the last 13 months there was not a single passenger fatality. This astounding improvement in safety was accomplished during a period of unparalleled expansion of operations.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to use to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH].

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word in opposition to the reorganization plan of the President relating to the Civil Aeronautics Authority. I intend to vote for the resolution to set the plan aside. We should be glad we did not listen to the ardent new dealers who tried to prevail upon the Congress to give the President blanket authority to reorganize the executive branch of the Government. We should be glad we retained a check on the exercise of the power delegated. If we had not done so we would be unable to do anything with respect to the action taken by the President in connection with the Civil Aeronautics Authority.

The reorganization plan submitted by the President would, in substance, abolish the Air Safety Board, strip the Civil Aeronautics Authority of its independence, and place regulatory control of air transportation and civil aeronautics under the Department of Commerce. One of the major reasons offered by the President for his proposal is that by placing the Civil Aeronautics Authority in the Department of Commerce it would have representation at the Cabinet table.

Mr. Chairman, the argument advanced by the President in behalf of his proposal is really an argument against it. We have already had experience with the politics-ridden Bureau of Air Commerce. Congress deliberately made the Civil Aeronautics Authority an independent agency because of that experience. And the remarkable improvement in air transportation in the last 2 years is evidence of the wisdom of Congress in taking that step.

As an independent agency the Authority has been able to speak directly to the Congress. But the President would make it a subordinate bureau able to act only through the Secretary of Commerce. It would be at the mercy of a single man, and that was one of the troubles with the old Bureau of Air Commerce. Moreover, it should be pointed out that our railroads, our merchant marine, and our motor carriers are regulated by independent agencies and not by subordinate bureaus.

It would be a serious mistake if we allow the Civil Aeronautics Authority to become a subordinate bureau, whose personnel and budget would be controlled by the Secretary of Commerce. Under the old Bureau of Air Commerce we witnessed a high death rate for passengers and pilots. Under the present Civil Aeronautics Authority and the Air Safety Board we have made remarkable strides both in the efficiency and safety of air transportation. I cannot approve a return to the old system which, in essence, the President has recommended. [Applause.]

Under leave to revise and extend my remarks, I am inserting a copy of a letter addressed by one of my constituents, Mr. Wayne Carpenter, of Waukegan, Ill., to Senator PAT MCCARRAN on this subject. I feel it merits special attention because it expresses the views of a small, indepedent aviation operator.

MAY 5, 1940.

Senator PAT MCCARRAN,
United States Senator from Nevada,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: As a charter member of the Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association I want to amplify, from the viewpoint of a small independent aviation operator who has trained 79 pilots this year (without injury or fatality to anyone and without subsidy of any kind), what is stated by Mr. Hartranft in his letter of May 2, 1940, to you.

We are a struggling young industry which, if free from the rumors, turmoil, and uncertain status of rapidly changing "screwball" policies in Washington (for example the Eugene Vidal regime in the Department of Commerce), can mean a lot to business recovery.

Under the Civil Aeronautics Authority we (the nonscheduled phase of the industry) have had greater expansion along sound lines than in any other period of our struggling existence. It has been stated that the Civil Aeronautics Authority will remain independent, if Reorganization Order No. IV goes into effect. According to that order the Secretary of Commerce will have charge of budgetary, accounting, and other such functions for the Authority. It is axiomatic that the man who supervises the cash for a given activity, has supervision in other ways over that activity. The President, the Attorney General, and Mr. Smith of the Budget Bureau, and Congressman COCHRAN, in his radio address on May 3, ignore this vital point. Mr. Smith was quoted in the press here as stating that, while the Civil Aeronautics Board, under the reorganization plan, is to be independent, the Secretary of Commerce may add his comments to the Board's reports and decisions. The President has given as justification for his plan No. IV, that civil aviation may be represented at Cabinet meetings. If the Secretary of Commerce controls the budget, may add his comments to decisions of the Board (why make them if they will not mean anything?), and represents civil aviation at Cabinet meetings, the independence of the Civil Aeronautics Authority will be what we in aviation call zero zero. I have heard arguments in opposition to the plan termed "spinach." To many of us who have struggled against odds for years to get somewhere in this business, this vague answer to an extremely important problem makes us fearful of our futures.

This reorganized Board may work, with a certain degree of success, with such a man as Robert Hinckley as Assistant Secretary of Commerce, but Mr. Hinckley will undoubtedly have other duties to perform and perhaps cannot give the attention to civil-aviation problems which they deserve. And can aviation count always on having such men as Mr. Nobel and Hinckley in the Department of Commerce? The record under the well-intentioned Mr. Daniel Roper and Mr. J. M. Johnson was a disastrous one.

With regard to the Air Safety Board, although it seems to some to be in duplication of the function performed by the regular Government inspectors, this, in the opinion of many in our branch of aviation which flies more miles and operates more aircraft (or did in the year 1938) than the military services and the air lines combined, is just as necessary as a coroner is necessary. The pilot and aircraft owner does not want the policeman (inspector) to be the coroner also. But, in my opinion, the coroner (Air Safety Board) should not follow pilots and planes around to prevent their having accidents. The Air Safety Board should investigate and report causes of accidents and make recommendations as the result. It should not be wiped out by having its duties combined with those of the Board which passes on the safety rules. If this takes place, we will be back to the sorry mess we had under the Department of Commerce when the investigators were investigating themselves and naturally had a human-nature tendency to pass the buck of responsibility to the other fellow.

The Air Safety Board has been a hair shirt to a lot of people, including the private and nonscheduled operator and apparently to the President and the Civil Aeronautics Authority. Some would like to be rid of the hair shirt but it has been good for us—just having it set up the way it is makes us operate more safely.

For the above reasons, and as a practical operator who does not consider himself uninformed on this subject, nor has he, to his knowledge, ever been considered gullible, I hope and pray that this reorganization order will be defeated.

Sincerely,

WAYNE CARPENTER,
Owner and Manager, Waukegan Air Service.

This organization has soloed 87 students, flown over 500,000 miles, made over 10,000 landings and take-offs; at present we have 5 flying clubs in operation with 85 members and 150 students.

W. C.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRADLEY].

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, at the risk of being accused of being ignorant and gullible and even stooping to play politics or indulging in a bit of "spinach," I want to raise my voice in protest against Reorganization Plan IV, which I consider to be untimely, ill-advised, and unsound in logic.

Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to question the sincerity of anyone in his treatment of aeronautics. We cannot escape the fact, however, that whenever the President has acted in the aeronautics picture he has invariably created chaos and confusion within the entire industry, to say nothing of resultant accidents with a tremendous destruction of life and property. The aeronautical picture changed quickly when the New Deal took over in 1933. We had the unfortunate experiment of the Army flying the mails and the cancelation of the air-mail contracts which drove all air-line fleets out of the sky temporarily. Then the President turned over the operation of aeronautics to four strictly political appointees, each having the support of some political "Major Domo," and each of whom immediately set to work to build up his own political organization within the Bureau of Air Commerce, which resulted in no end of chaos and confusion. The aeronautics industry itself then went to work on the Congress, representing the people of the United States, and after years of bitter controversy got enacted into law by the Congress the Civil Aeronautics Act, conceived by and drafted for the aeronautics industry by those who were in the industry and knew what they wanted in order to make for safety in aviation in this country.

Now, I do not need to repeat to you again the harrowing list of accidents which preceded the creation of the Civil Aeronautics Authority and the Air Safety Board. Those figures have been given to you and the public often enough. The unmistakable fact remains that when the control of aviation passed out of the hands of the President and the Department of Commerce in 1938 into the hands of an independently created bureau, answerable directly to the Congress as well as the President, that air safety and the entire aeronautical industry rapidly regained its accustomed stride. Therefore I say to you that when we are reminded of the unmistakable fact that not a single accident has occurred on the air lines in this country over the past 13 months, in which our planes night and day, in good weather and bad, have flown over a billion passenger-miles and created the greatest safety record in any form of transportation at any time in the past, then I say to you respectfully that it is indeed untimely to change that set-up as now proposed. I care not who created it, a perfect record is hard to beat—harder to criticize. When I say to you that Reorganization Plan IV is ill-conceived or ill-advised, then I say that you have only to recall the failures of the past, the success of the present, and the present proposal to return to the folly of the past.

It has been said that friction exists in the present organization. I am convinced that friction does not exist to any greater degree now than it did to my personal knowledge during the dark days of air commerce.

Unquestionably there exists friction between individuals, and unquestionably some friction existed originally between the Air Safety Board and the Civil Aeronautics Authority. I have previously pointed out to you that this friction originated when Col. Sumpter Smith, one of Harold Hopkins' pets, was personally placed in control of the Air Safety Board by the President. Colonel Smith learned how to pour the people's money down the rat hole when he was building airports for the W. P. A. It was not strange therefore, as soon as he took over the chairmanship of the Air Safety Board, that he immediately proceeded to set up an entirely separate organization on a Nation-wide scale, the cost of which he made no effort to even predict; but it was his intention to create in effect a separate organization in direct competition with the other, and this naturally led to friction. Later we know that in direct contravention of the law, which required that the members of the Air Safety Board must give all their time to that work and undertake no other duties, that he then assumed charge of the construction of the Gravelly Point Airport here in Washington. In so doing he not only violated the express word and intent of the original law but proceeded to take so much time away from his Air Safety Board duties that the other two members found it necessary to remove him as Chairman, and later he resigned, and since that time the Air Safety Board has continued to function with remarkable smoothness and efficiency.

But, for the sake of argument, let us assume that some friction does exist at the present time. We know the history of the past. If one lived in a rat-infested hovel, he might be excused for building himself a new, modern home. If a rat got into that new home, I would assume he would drive the rat out and not burn down the house. If we have the same condition existing in aeronautics right now, it is quite possible to drive the rat out of the house, not burn it down. But because aeronautics has prospered under a bureau created by the Members of Congress, as requested by and laid out by the aeronautics industry itself, I say it is indeed ill founded to now propose to turn it back into the old rat-infested Bureau of Air Commerce, completely dominated by politics under the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, I have yet to talk to a pilot, I have yet to talk to an air-line official, I have yet to talk to a private owner of an airplane or a private pilot who favors this change.

Let us continue to give aeronautics that which it should have, that which it has proven it must have to prosper; that is, independent regulation by an independent bureau created by and responsible to the Congress of the United States. If the present set-up needs change, let the Congress, and Congress only, do its constituted legislative duty and clean the rats out of the house—not burn it down. [Applause.]

Mr. MUNDT. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. It seems to me that, inasmuch as we are discussing something of tremendous importance to the lives of many Americans, a quorum should be present, and I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ROMJUE). The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and three Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois is a member of the committee and I yield the gentleman 10 minutes of my time.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, let me address an answer to the indictment that was leveled by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] against the members of the Air Safety Board of the Civil Aeronautics Authority. That indictment consisted in large measure, first of all, of showing the use of governmental time for other than strictly business purposes, a flight to some town in Texas for the purpose of addressing a convention as against this reorganization plan and certain administrative difficulties that obviously, according to him, existed in the Air Safety Board. That whole indictment can be dismissed at once. In the first place, if it is as bad as our good friend states, then the President should have discharged those gentlemen. That is the answer. As to whether the President has authority to discharge them, we go back to the Humphreys case of 1935. I think that settles that. Finally, we might state that if it is as bad as alleged, why abolish the Air Safety Board? Why burn down the barn to get at a few people in the barn, and yet that is the brunt of the whole argument that was advanced here for more than 30 minutes, and certainly it constitutes no reason for approval of the pending plan, No. IV.

Mr. Chairman, I am curious to know who wants this plan. Did the industry want it? You have not heard a word from anybody to indicate that they want this change in the Civil Aeronautics Authority. Is it the air-line pilots, the men who fly these great corsairs of the sky, and who undertake the responsibility for human life? Is it the pilot and the aggregation of pilots who have flown over 2,000,000 people in the last 12 months without a single death or injury to a member of the crew or to a single member of the traveling public? Do they want it? Then read the statement of David Boehnke, the president of the Air Line Pilots' Association, who pleads with the Congress to defeat this reorganization proposal. Is it the traveling public that wants it? Then listen and learn from those who do fly of their keen opposition to this proposal, ranging from General Johnson and other air travelers on down. Is it the insurance group that wants it? Listen to this telegram from the Associated Aviation Underwriters, to Senator McCARRAN dated April 29:

> Drastic reductions in rates have been made during the last year, due to excellent experience which our unemotional analysis indicates due in no small measure to present Civil Aeronautics Authority and Air Safety Board arrangement. Therefore urge you strongly resist suggested transfer to the Department of Commerce.

No; the Associated Aviation Underwriters are opposed to it. Does labor want it? Read the letter that William Green, of the American Federation of Labor, addressed to Senator McCARRAN on the 29th day of April, and I quote only the last sentence to this effect:

> The American Federation of Labor heartily endorses your Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 43 to set aside Reorganization Plan No. IV.

The industry does not want it, the underwriters do not want it, the pilots do not want it, the public does not want it, labor does not want it. I am wondering who wants this reorganization plan as proposed by the President. How singular that there has not been a single hearing on this proposal. You know how it began? In December 1939 the President asked the administrative management section of the Budget Bureau to make an investigation and they did, and they brought in this proposal. A gentleman named Donald Stone is the Assistant Director of the Budget Bureau in charge of that work. Who actually did the work does not appear. It seems rather strange, however, that the report of the Budget Bureau was inserted in the RECORD by our good friend the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] not so long ago, but oddly enough the Budget Bureau's report was not signed, and I am curious to know the names of the personnel who may have fabricated that report. In any event that is where it started, and what an amazing concatenation of events have followed since that time. You know chronology is a very interesting thing. This started on the 4th of December 1939. The second step in chronological order is this: April 3, the third reorganization plan to clarify the functions of the Administrator in the Civil Aeronautics Authority; April 11, plan No. 4, which is before us at the present time; April 30, the President's statement to the public in which he talked about well-intentioned people staking out an exclusive claim for the safety of lives. It is very regrettable that the Chief Magistrate of the Nation had to use that language. April 30, the Democratic members of the Special Reorganization Committee of the House went to the White House and had their photographs taken before they came away.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD], and myself, who are minority members, were not invited on that exploratory expedition. [Laughter.]

May 1 the name of Col. Monroe Johnson, Assistant Director in the Department of Commerce, was sent to the United States Senate for confirmation as a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission. You see, that was to cushion the objection; that was to cushion the great surging wave of protest that was beginning to rise in the country.

May 3 a letter from the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, either directed to the Secretary of Commerce or to the Chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Authority—and I cannot tell which, because the letter as inserted by Senator BYRNES was directed to the Secretary of Commerce, while the same letter which was inserted in the RECORD by our good friend from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] was apparently addressed to the Chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Authority. So I am not clear on it, in view of the fact that the letter on two separate occasions was inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD apparently addressed to two different sources. But there in 16 specific different items the Director of the Bureau of the Budget undertakes to tell why this plan should be approved. Certainly the letter is full of absurdities, and, in fact, constitutes an entirely new plan.

May 3 a letter from the Attorney General of the United States appeared telling why, in his judgment, this plan as proposed was quite all right.

May 4 it was intimated to the public that Mr. Hinckley, present Chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Authority, would have a place in the Department of Commerce, so that this agency which is to go to the Department of Commerce would be under the nurturing of kind and experienced hands.

So this blitzkrieg against the Civil Aeronautics Authority, which began way back in December, is finally dissipated in a great smoke screen. [Laughter.]

I am rather surprised at this. I cannot find out from anybody who is affected by this proposal what they want; there have not been any hearings. Nobody's advice has been asked, and then there comes confusion worse confounded in order to take the thought of the public from the fact as to what this will do.

Now, when they attack the Air Safety Board the fact remains that a great safety record is there. Neither the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN], the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], or Mr. Roosevelt or Mr. Hinckley or Mr. Monroe Johnson or anyone else can dissipate the effect of the record for the last 12 months—aye, for the last 20 months. Not a single fatality in 408 days; not a single life lost in 408 days; not a single plane dashed to the ground in 408 days. If that is what friction will do in a governmental agency, then, by the great eternal, give us more friction. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. In your discussion of the question of all these dates, I wonder if the gentleman could tell me when the Budget Bureau report was brought up? I have a copy of it here. It is supposed to be the original report, and there is no date on it and no signature. It is not addressed to anybody. I just wonder if the gentleman could give me that date?

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is enveloped in mystery like all blitzkriegs are enveloped in mystery when they start.

Now, there is the record: 90,000,000 miles in 12 months, 2,000,000 passengers carried, not a life lost.

Now, an attack is leveled at Tom Hardin, Chairman of the Safety Board. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] says perhaps there is something to be desired in his record of aerial experience. Well, let us see what is to be desired. Tom Hardin and the Board came before the Appropriations Committee in connection with the appropriations for 1940. It is my privilege to serve as a member of that subcommittee. So we asked the members of the Board to submit some biographical data. Here is the data on Tom Hardin, Chairman of the Air Safety Board: He was the senior air-line pilot for American Air Lines. He holds the highest pilot's license that is available to anyone. He is rated for instrument flying and blind flying. He has had a great aviation background. Besides, he has officially 10,000 hours to his credit in the air. Page 1885, hearings on the appropriation bill for 1940, available to any Member of the House, will disclose this.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. KLEBERG. I might add to that documentary evidence that I have spent a great many hours personally flying with Tom Hardin as I have flown with many pilots. In my estimation, no better pilot was ever at the controls of a plane than Tom Hardin. [Applause.] I just wanted to make that contribution.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I thank the gentleman from Texas.

So all that has been said about the Air Safety Board, all that has been said about friction down there has an answer, and the answer is this: A gentleman named Col. Sumpter Smith, who, by indirection at least, our good friend the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] defended on this floor just a brief while ago, has been derelict in his duties as a member of the Safety Board. When he should be discharging his responsibility as a member of the Air Safety Board, as the law provides, he was partially engaged with this new glorified airport down on the Potomac River. The Civil Aeronautics Authority Act provides that his full time shall be devoted to the job of safety. Where was he? He was giving only partial time down there, and the rest of the time he was down on the Potomac supervising the airport work. We invested him with a responsibility under the law of 1938 to discharge his responsibility in behalf of public safety; and was he doing it? No; he was not doing it. That is the reason for the friction; that is the reason for the trouble; that is the reason that Tom Hardin and Mr. Allen went to the White House and saw Colonel Watson. All the testimony is there in the file if anybody cares to read it. That is the answer.

What is wrong with this pending reorganization program? I will tell you what is wrong. There are two things, and that is all that time will permit me to develop. The first is—and do not forget it—that you invest in the Secretary of Commerce the authority specifically for procurement, for accounting, for budgeting, for management control. You give Harry Hopkins the authority to spend $27,000,000 and to look after the interest of 5,042 people in that agency.

The net effect of the proposal before us is this:

It transfers the Civil Aeronautics Authority and its functions to the Department of Commerce. It transfers the Administrator and his functions to the Department of Commerce. It transfers the functions of the Air Safety Board to the Department of Commerce. And then vests those functions in the new Civil Aeronautics Board. It renames the Civil Aeronautics Authority and calls it a Board. The Air Safety Board is abolished. The functions of the Administrator are to be administered under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of Commerce.

The Civil Aeronautics Board shall report to Congress and the President through the Secretary. The Civil Aeronautics Board shall continue to exercise its rule-making and adjudication powers independent of the Secretary. Finally, all of the budgeting, accounting, personnel, procurement, and management functions are to be performed under the direction and supervision of the Secretary.

Now, what are the reasons advanced for the plan? In so far as I can learn, they are about as follows: First, that it will provide representation for Civil Aeronautics at a Cabinet table; secondly, that the work in this field can be coordinated with the work of the Weather Bureau and the Coast and Geodetic Survey; third, that it will prevent friction; fourth, that it will effect economy; fifth, that it will result in prompt translation of safe findings into remedial action; and, sixth, that the President will be more closely advised of developments in the field of civil aviation.

Let me offer some general observations on this whole matter. Despite the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN], there has been no scandal in the C. A. A. It began a herculean task to take over the work of the old Bureau of Air Commerce, add to the personnel, set up an administrative system, establish field offices, and initiate the work which was authorized in the Civil Aeronautics Act. Considering the enormity of the task, it must be admitted that the C. A. A. and the Air Safety Board have done quite well.

If, as the gentleman from Missouri contended in his radio address of May 2, that sooner or later the aviation industry, along with other governmental activities in the field of transportation, will be consolidated in a newly created Department of Transportation, then why transfer the C. C. A. to the Department of Commerce now only to have to retransfer it to a new Transportation Department at some future time?

I cannot emphasize too strongly the fact that the President had authority to ask for resignation if alleged friction and discord existed, but seemingly the President, the Budget Bureau, and others preferred to use any existence of friction as the vehicle on which to black-out the independent character of this whole agency.

If it is economy which is desired, I share with the President that desire, but I am not insensible of the fact that the $380,000 per year which is appropriated for the Air Safety Board can easily by mere action more than be offset by a single major air accident.

As for the investigation record of the Air Safety Board, the true fact is that in the last 21 months it has investigated 2,947 crashes, transmitted 2,300 accident reports, and made 115 remedial recommendations. In the light of all these circumstances, it is an excellent record.

Say what you will, the appropriations for the Civil Aeronautics Board if it is ever transferred to Commerce will be under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce. He will appear before the Budget Bureau. He will appear before the appropriations committees of Congress. He will have power to shift appropriations within his own Department and put this agency on meager rations if he is so disposed. Under such circumstances I would find it difficult indeed to believe that it will not become just another bureau among many bureaus in the Department of Commerce, and that it would constitute a backward step for the civil-aviation industry.

This Congress will concur in a genuine service upon the air-traveling public of this country, upon a growing industry, upon the pilots, upon the investors, and upon every part which has an interest in aviation by repudiating the plan which is now before us when it comes on for a record vote.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 6 additional minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the act specifically states that all the procurement, personnel, management, and Budget functions shall be carried on under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of Commerce. Thus Mr. Hopkins will inherit an agency of 5,000 people, a normal appropriation of $27,000,000 for 1941; and do not for a minute think that he will not use that authority. If I am to run an agency, I want to pick out the people. If you will just let me pick out the people to run the show, you can take all the rest of it, but I will be able to impose my policies and my thinking on that agency. Well, you are going to bury this in bureaucracy such as we had starting with 1926 and continuing to 1938. All right, if you want to go back to that, O. K., then vote against the disapproval of this plan. But if you believe that this agency has done a good job in the interest of safety, the regulation and encouragement of aviation, then the thing to do is to disapprove Reorganization Plan No. 4.

The second major reason is this: The Civil Aeronautics Board under this Authority will still make rules, they will still make regulations, they will still do the adjudicating, they will still issue certificates to pilots, they will still issue certificates to aircraft. All right. They are making the traffic rules, and ostensibly they ought to make an independent investigation of safety. But let us see about that. Suppose they issue a certificate to a piece of aircraft that is faulty as in the case of the one that dropped at Oklahoma City which had a bad propeller, an old-style propeller, and an old-style, obsolete control mechanism. When they investigated this what happened? The very fact of human nature dictates that they will have to whitewash themselves. Am I right, I ask the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. MAY. That is right.

Mr. DIRKSEN. You would not reproach yourself. Obviously you could not. The mistake was made in the first instance to issue a certificate to a defective piece of aircraft. They are expected to investigate it, but all the Presidential rhetoric, all language that the President or anybody else can pack into any kind of order, or regulation, or plan, cannot offset the persuasive force of human nature, that you are not going to hurt yourself when the record comes in. So when the Civil Aeronautics Board under this plan investigates itself there is not a Member in this Chamber who cannot dictate the answer in advance. That is what is wrong with this thing: The cause of public safety will suffer. The Civil Aeronautics Board becomes the judge, the jury, and the prosecutor. I say to you that I shall never give my support or endorsement to that kind of plan.

How singular, Mr. Chairman. It is exactly 2 years ago this afternoon that we were first debating the Civil Aeronautics Act. It came on this floor on the 7th of May, 1938. It went into effect on the 22d of August 1938. Two years to the day from the time we were debating the creation of the Civil Aeronautics Authority here comes a plan to push it into oblivion despite the pilots, despite the industry, despite the insurance underwriters, despite anybody who has an interest in aviation. That is the story in a nutshell.

They say to me, Oh, the Air Safety Board only has authority to investigate and then to recommend remedial action. How short-sighted and stupid that statement. They have a far more potent force at their command. It is to investigate and put it on the front page and let the public do the rest. On May 6, 1935, in the small hours of the morning Senator Cutting fell out of the sky at Mason, Mo., and came to an untimely death. What brought about the Civil Aeronautics Authority and the investigation was a great surge of public sentiment as the result of the untimely death of a very promising and virile young Member of the United States Senate. That created the Civil Aeronautics Authority. Gentleman on the Democratic side, in spite of whatever your loyalty may be, are you going to be a party to retarding the progress of civil aviation in the country by pushing us back more than 5 years over the time that the progress was made? [Applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 20 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I anxiously awaited the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], because if there is any one man on the Republican side of the House who should know something about the Civil Aeronautics Authority it is the gentleman from Illinois, who just preceded me. He is a member of the subcommittee that handles the appropriation for the Civil Aeronautics Authority. He has always been most attentive to his duties by attending all meetings. The gentleman from Illinois stated there is danger in Mr. Harry Hopkins, Secretary of Commerce, spending $27,000,000. If the gentleman understands the law and if he understands the decisions of the Bureau of the Budget, as well as the Attorney General, he will find that Harry Hopkins cannot spend 27 cents. He also talked about Mr. Smith shirking his duty.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Does the gentleman care to yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am sure the gentleman is familiar with the terminology of plan No. IV and with the fact that budget, accounting, personnel, procurement, and related routine management functions of the C. A. A. shall be performed under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of Commerce through such facilities as he shall designate or establish.

Mr. COCHRAN. I will define that for the gentleman. My definition of that is a little bit different from yours.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes, but the gentleman is not going to formulate the definition. Mr. Hopkins is going to do that.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman is not going to formulate the definition for me either and he is not going to make it for the Budget Director.

They have a division in the Department of Commerce that attends to all such matters. Is there any harm in saving the taxpayers' money by letting them use these services for the Civil Aeronautics Board when it is only paper work. That is going to be the extent of the control of the Secretary of Commerce.

The gentleman spoke about Mr. Smith and stated that he did not attend to his duties, but Mr. Smith is no longer a member of the Civil Aeronautics Authority or Board of Air Safety. He is out of the picture.

Mr. DIRKSEN. For clarification, the gentleman knows that the statement that was made——

Mr. COCHRAN. I know he is no longer there.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is quite beside the point. There is a vacancy there and it can be filled at any time.

Mr. COCHRAN. He has another job and he is performing it very well.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Why did not the President discharge the members of the Air Safety Board?

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Smith is supervising the construction of the greatest airport in the world just across the Potomac River.

Mr. DIRKSEN. What has that to do with the Air Safety Board?

Mr. COCHRAN. Nothing; I want to show he is not with the Board.

I do not think there is anything I can possibly say that will have any effect on the Members to my left, because, as usual, reorganization becomes a political football, and, as your leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN], announced, there is not one Member on the minority side who will vote to support the President. Further than that, a lady, a member of the Republican National Committee, announces this morning how autocratic the President is in following out his obligations and responsibilities in trying to put his own house in order. So I am going to direct my remarks to my colleagues on the Democratic side of the House.

Mr. Chairman, I regret this is a partisan issue. I have never looked upon reorganization from a partisan standpoint, and I have been a member of every reorganization committee that we have had around here since the days of President Hoover.

Just what does the President do? As the gentleman from Illinois said, he puts the Civil Aeronautics Authority in the Department of Commerce and abolishes the Air Safety Board. You will remember how the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER], when the reorganization bill was up, argued, "Do not give the President the power to destroy functions." When the bill finally became law there was a provision in it which denied the President the right to destroy functions; so no matter what you might say, under no condition can the President of the United States, or anyone else, destroy the functions of the present Civil Aeronautics Authority or the Air Safety Board. Bear that in mind.

The gentleman from Illinois spoke a moment ago about the Civil Aeronautics Authority getting the power to make investigations. Is it not making them now? But he complained about investigating themselves in the event that they might issue a certificate and the plane was later found to be faulty.

Now, who is Chairman of the Air Safety Board? Mr. Tom Hardin. What position did he occupy—and he might occupy it yet for all I know? He is vice president of the Pilots'

Association. Has not Mr. Hardin been investigating his fellow pilots, members of the association of which he was vice chairman? You do not complain about Mr. Hardin investigating accidents in which pilots are concerned. Why complain because the Civil Aeronautics Authority investigates accidents? Be consistent.

Some statements have been made about the Air Safety Board and how it has functioned. The gentleman from Illinois said if there is friction in the Department, and friction saves life, give us more friction. He indicates that the Air Safety Board is responsible for the saving of lives.

The gentleman from Illinois sat in the hearings when Mr. Hardin appeared, and if you will refer to his testimony, you will see that he said, in attempting to justify the $380,000 which he sought for the Air Safety Board:

> At the present time the Air Safety Board is in arrears some 1,022 accident dockets which have not been analyzed and acted upon by the Board.

When was that? That was in December 1939, and the act had only been in operation since June 1938. Yet they are 1,022 dockets in arrears in 18 months of operation. How many are they in arrears now? Mr. Hardin, the man who made that statement, is the one who kicked up this fuss just as soon as the President announced this plan. His effort is to save his job. The propaganda has been inspired and is one-sided.

The president of the Air Pilots' Association, who was president when Mr. Hardin was vice president, sent the pilots on here and he said they knew nothing about politics, but I am told they were pretty well schooled when they got here. I say they are a fine set of men, but badly misinformed. They saw the various Congressmen. They did not come to see me. I do not know why. I was going to try and arrange to have them name a committee of two or three to go with me to see if I could not get them an audience with the President to let him explain the order, but they never came near me. Of course, I know I am only one Member of this House, but nevertheless, I was chairman of the reorganization committee. They did not ask for any hearings—simply put, or tried to put, the pressure on Members.

They said they were a lobby to save lives. I hope they always save lives. I do not want to see anyone get killed in an airplane accident or in any manner any more than anyone else does, and I know no Member of this body, or any public official, wants to see anyone get killed; but when these gentlemen come here and try to tell you that the Air Safety Board is responsible for the great record that has been made in recent months, which was celebrated here just a few weeks ago, they are certainly taking a lot of credit away from themselves. It is those very pilots, coupled with the cooperation of the air-line corporations, as well as the rules and regulations of the Civil Aeronautics Authority, that are responsible for what has happened in safety in air. Do not let anybody tell you any different. That resulted in the outstanding record that has been made, and which we all hope will continue to be made.

Just look at the difference in the situation that prevails now and what formerly prevailed. I recall that while I was in St. Louis everyone was shocked by reading of a great disaster in the southwestern part of the country. One of the finest ships in operation at the time was destroyed and the pilots and everyone else in it lost their lives. A friend of mine called me up over the telephone and told me that the weather bureau at Denver twice broadcasted and also sent telegrams to all the air fields in the southwestern and western part of the country predicting the most serious electrical storms in years, and warned the companies to keep their ships on the ground. The slogan then was not "The lobby to save lives"; the slogan at that time was "Keep the air schedule." Instead of following out the recommendations of the United States Weather Bureau and staying on the ground, they took off, and every one of them lost their lives.

I saw some reports in reference to that storm. I read the report of an old gentleman who ran a little store up on top of one of the mountains. He was about 70 years old and was an observer for the Weather Bureau. He said he was born and lived in the vicinity all his life, but never saw such an electrical storm, and it was in the area the pilot was supposed to go through.

Today you have to have a certain ceiling, a certain clearance, not only at the place where you take off but where you are going to land, or you stay on the ground. They obey storm warnings; there is cooperation now. That is what has caused this great record to be made, and not the Air Safety Board, because the Air Safety Board has absolutely nothing to do with the making of rules and regulations. Their sole responsibility is to investigate. They go to the scene of an accident, and another set of investigators from the Civil Aeronautics Authority likewise go. They are both on the same job. They cooperate up to a certain point, then they go in different directions. They both make their reports. The Air Safety Board makes recommendations if it seems justified in doing so, and there their responsibility and authority end. They could not change a regulation, they could not make a regulation if they desired; only suggest.

To say the Civil Aeronautics Authority itself cannot perform the duties of the Air Safety Board is foolish. It is surprising to me that some of the gentlemen on my left who are so interested in economy have not long since offered an amendment to some legislation on the floor of the House to stop this duplication of work, thus saving money.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman care to yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield to my friend.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman made a remark a little while ago that he never has treated this as a political matter. I want to pay a great tribute to his loyalty to all these measures. He finds no fault with any of them. To illustrate that, "He told the maid to ask his wife, who was going to Florida, if he was going, too."

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is always interesting, but I was surprised he did not have something to say today that was worth while and that someone could answer.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. In just a minute.

I want to get to the independence of the Authority, about which the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] spoke. The Director of the Budget—and his conclusions were concurred in by the Attorney General—wrote the Secretary of Commerce, in reply to his request for information, telling the Secretary he has absolutely no power and no authority to discharge any of the duties of the Civil Aeronautics Authority. The law provides that they must report to the Congress and to the President. The President did not even have the power to change that requirement, because that is part of the Authority's functions. They are still going to report to the Congress and to the President, but the Secretary of Commerce will bring the report to the White House. That is what he is going to do with that. The Director of the Budget further pointed out that when the Authority makes its reports the Secretary of Commerce cannot delete one word. He also told the Secretary the Authority is in no way divested of its power in connection with the personnel. The Authority still controls the personnel, and do not forget that the personnel is under civil service. Do you know that? You talk about politics. How about the Administrator? Do you know him, Everett?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I know him very well, personally.

Mr. COCHRAN. He is a wonderful fellow, is he not?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; I will say for Mr. Hester that he is a good Administrator, but he has never had an hour's experience in the air. That was the testimony before our committee.

Mr. COCHRAN. He is doing a fine job, is he not?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am wondering why Reorganization Plan No. III was brought in to clarify the authority between the Administrator and the Authority.

Mr. COCHRAN. Because the law did not specifically define their duties.

The President was not required to place a civil-service man in the position of Administrator. If he had wanted, he could have placed a politician in that most important position.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

The President could have put anybody he desired in that position, because it was exempted from civil service, but what did he do? He picked up a career man, a man who has had nearly 30 years of service as a civil-service employee with the Federal Government—I do not believe anyone knows his politics, if he has any—and the President made him the Administrator. There is no evidence there that the President has ever tried to inject politics into the Civil Aeronautics Authority. He has tried to make the Air Safety Board function without success.

Now, on this same question of independence, it might be well to point out that other independent boards function in an entirely satisfactory manner in the Department of Commerce at present and in other departments as well. The Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation is one of a number of quasi-independent agencies in the Department of Commerce, and there are many others in departments. Let me read this quotation regarding these independent agencies in various Government departments:

> They are expressly established by law rather than by departmental action; their functions and procedures are largely created by law; under the law they make their own decisions or orders independent of the head of the department within which they are located; the law provides that their action may be final, or that appeals from it lie not to the head of the department but to the courts; they, rather than the head of the department, are responsible for seeing that the law under which they operate is enforced. (From pp. 41–42, Federal Regulatory Action and Control, by F. F. Blachly and M. E. Oatman, Brookings Institution.)

Under the President's Reorganization Plans Nos. III and IV, the Civil Aeronautics Board within the Department of Commerce will be operating under its own law, the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938, which is an entirely different situation from the old type of organization within the Department of Commerce, when the Bureau of Air Commerce was set up by the Secretary of Commerce by virtue of his own executive authority and was therefore subject to his complete domination.

This Board and not the Secretary of Commerce will be responsible under this basic law.

The plain intent of Congress was to separate the economic regulatory functions of the Government from the administrative problems attached to the enforcement of these regulations. It was plainly intended that the Authority should be relieved of as much of the administrative problem as possible, in order that it might have the freedom to consider and act promptly on the problems of economic regulation. For this purpose an Administrator of Civil Aeronautics was set up. The very complexity of the subject has, as shown by experience, to a large extent nullified this distinction which was plain in the legislative intent, but which the wording of the act itself was inadequate to make effectual. The President's Reorganization Plans Nos. III and IV not only cure these organizational defects but take advantage of all the experience gained in the operation of this act.

Based on experience, the Weather Bureau is transferred to the Commerce Department. The Coast and Geodetic Survey is already a part of the Department of Commerce, and the coordination of its aeronautical functions with those of the agencies now being transferred brings all Federal agencies related to civil aeronautics into one close-knit administrative agency. The President's plan thus takes advantage of all the experience gained both prior to and after the enactment of the Civil Aeronautics Act.

We are not dealing with a small agency now. This is the fastest-growing industry in this country. Last December $600,000,000, according to the Chairman of the Board, was invested, and they say that by this time $1,000,000,000 has been invested in commercial aviation. During the present year $108,000,000 is being spent by the Government in connection with aviation. This money comes from the taxpayers and must be safely guarded.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts for a question.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I am very glad that the gentleman will yield. In 1934 and on March 9——

Mr. COCHRAN. I thought the gentlewoman was going——

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I am, in the interest of safety——

Mr. COCHRAN. I must go along with this. I appreciate the gentlewoman's interest in safety. She has often demonstrated her interest.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. It is only for safety and you would not yield to me then and adjourned the House rather than let me speak.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 more minutes.

This sum of money I just mentioned before being interrupted warrants that the President be continually advised of the operations of the Civil Aeronautics Authority and what is going on in all branches of aviation. How is he going to be advised continually except by having someone at the Cabinet table to tell him what is going on? With over 125 independent agencies in this Government, you know as well as I know it is absolutely impossible for the President to see the heads of these agencies as often as he should see them, but in this way you have the Secretary of Commerce bringing reports to the Cabinet table as to what is going on in commercial aviation; and, furthermore, civilian instructors of the Authority are now training cadets for the War Department on commercial fields. There is a hook-up between national defense and the Civil Aviation Authority. Do not overlook that. It is a proper matter to be discussed when the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of Commerce are all sitting around the table with the President.

I am not only in favor of this order but I would go much further, and there are some of you here now who will be here at the time when what I say now is going to be an absolute fact. It will not be very long before you are going to be asked to create a Department of Transportation in this Government, with a Secretary of Transportation sitting at the Cabinet table.

That day is coming, and you will have all forms of transportation in that Department of Transportation, rail, water, air, motor carrier, and so forth. It is an absolute necessity that this work be coordinated. For the time being, in the interest of economy and efficiency, I say to you that a grave mistake will be made if you do not sustain the President's recommendation with reference to placing the Civil Aeronautics Authority in the Department of Commerce and to provide for the abolition of the Air Safety Board.

You have a pilot-training program going on in 437 colleges.

You have dozens of factories manufacturing aircraft.

You have had over 2,000,000 passengers traveling over recognized air lines in the last year.

You have a billion dollars invested in the industry with thousands of stockholders.

I have received letters and a resolution adopted by the pilots' organization. Aside from that not one protest has reached me in opposition to the President's proposal. I am confident the pilots' opposition was inspired.

This order is for the betterment of aviation in all its branches. [Applause.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURDICK].

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to be numbered among those who assert that the reason why the President desires to transfer the duties of the Civil Aeronautics Authority to a new board under the Department of Commerce is to obtain political control of our air service. I am of the opinion that he feels this move will insure more safety and efficiency in making some department of the Government responsible. However laudable his purposes are, I do not agree with this transfer.

One body of men is solidly opposed to the transfer—the Air Pilots Association. While it has been said that this organization numbers about 150 men, yet it speaks with a power that mere superior numbers cannot refute. These men are the ones who risk their own lives every day and every night; these are the men into whose keeping the lives of millions of our citizens are committed annually; these are the men who for the past year have so piloted their planes that no major accident has occurred. Whose evidence shall we take, if not that which these men can give? Shall we listen to some spurred officer in the Department of Commerce, whose only use for spurs is to keep his feet on a mahogany desk? Shall we listen to some political leader who pretends to know more about airships than the men who build them and the men who operate them?

No, Mr. Chairman; I have heard the evidence. The pilots have spoken; and being wholly without better evidence, and being myself unfamiliar with the operation of this dangerous business, I will rest my case with their testimony, whether they number 150 or less. I shall vote to resist the transfer of the Civil Aeronautics Authority to the Department of Commerce. [Applause.]

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important debate here today, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and one Members present, a quorum.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 13 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS].

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I thought as late as this morning that I probably might support the President's reorganization plan because I wanted so much to conform with his wishes. However, after putting the last 3 hours before lunch into a study of the reorganization suggestion, together with certain letters written by the Bureau of the Budget, I find the plan in such a state of confusion that in the interest of a great young industry, and in the interest of the flying public, that much as I would like so to do, I cannot help but oppose the plan, and in so doing raise my voice against it. And therefore, Mr. Chairman, I take this time at the risk of being misunderstood. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN], when he was on his feet earlier in the afternoon, pointed to his record in support of the President. Well, I can point to a rather good record myself in support of those things which have been proposed by the President. I think in this instance that the President has not been properly advised. He is the busiest man probably in the United States; certainly he has more responsibility. And I venture the assertion that the President—and I make this assertion from reading press releases that he has given, and after seeing those press releases, I have read this proposed reorganization plan—I venture the assertion that the President does not know what is in this reorganization plan and I venture the further assertion that the men or the people who wrote it have not properly advised him as to what is in the plan.

I do not want to court the disfavor of the President. I was one of those who exerted my every effort side by side then with the President to have this Civil Aeronautics Authority created. It is deeply embarrassing on me at this time, knowing how the President feels about this matter, to find it necessary to be in opposition to his proposal. Obviously he must delegate to others the responsibility of detail. This cannot be escaped by any busy executive, and I repeat that the President, in the very nature of things, is not familiar with the garbled, the ill-advised, the confused details, contained in this reorganization plan.

I am not here, certainly, to defend the Air Safety Board. For the purposes of my argument, I am willing to admit that they should be fired. This is not a trial of Hardin and Allen. This is a matter of whether an independent agency which has done a grand job is to be scuttled into another bureau, where it cannot longer properly function. Let Allen and Hardin be convicted, so far as I am concerned. If the President is tired of them, and if they are not doing a good job, he had but to fire them, and if he cannot do that, then he had but to send to this House a reorganization plan which would have abolished the Air Safety Board, and left the rest of the Civil Aeronautics Authority against which not a single man has raised his voice today. It could stay there and function in the orderly manner that it was intended to function in the light of the action of the Congress less than 2 years ago.

My distinguished friend, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN], said that the Air Safety Board has bought more airplanes than it knows what to do with, except to go joy riding in them. Mr. Chairman, I am not defending the Safety Board now, but the Air Safety Board never bought any airplane. The Air Safety Board cannot purchase an airplane. That function lies only in the Authority itself, and it is a rule of the Board and of the Authority, and a good rule, that when planes owned by one branch of the Authority are not used by that branch that they be used by other branches of the Authority to save the expense of buying additional airplanes. It is a good rule.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] said that the industry is not against this reorganization. The president of the Air Transportation Association, Colonel Gorrell, sits in the gallery this minute, and, I presume, can hear my voice. Many of you know him. Call him to witness if the statement I am about to make is untrue. Every mechanic, every pilot, every executive, every air line, manufacturers, even, oppose Reorganization Plans III and IV and no one can gainsay that.

Let me take you through a few brief steps of what this thing will do if this is put under the Department of Commerce. This reorganization plan was born in confusion, and it is here in confusion. Follow me if you will, for I have written this so that I will not be liable to make mistakes. The confusion which Plan III, coupled with Plan IV, reorganizing the Civil Aeronautics Authority, will cause can be illustrated best by showing what an air carrier—and I mean an air line—would have to do, if these two plans are adopted. An airline carrier comes before the new Board that comes under the Department of Commerce, and it comes in there for authority to do business before it starts its operation. First, the carrier, before it starts to operate, will read the Civil Aeronautics Authority Act, and it will find very many provisions for administrative action. I am talking now about the present act. Then it will have to go to the Statutes at Large and the Federal Register to find plans III and IV now under consideration. It will notice in their terms a number of very ambiguous phrases from which it will gather the impression that there are two separate agencies in the Department of Commerce.

First. The Board and their Administrator exercise different ones of the various powers set forth in this act.

Now, follow me. Under your reorganization plan you come under the Department of Commerce, and there will be set up one agency as a Board and the other as Administrator. Now, follow me. Then, if the company is fortunate enough to know about a letter from the Budget Bureau to the Authority dated May 2, 1940, which is an interpretation or an attempt to interpret what Reorganization Plans III and IV mean—it has been read. Of course, it is not law and never will be, but the Budget Bureau attempts, and uses page after page, to straighten out whoever is muddled up on what this means. This air carrier had better be cognizant of it, too, when he makes his application.

As I say, if it is fortunate enough to know about a letter from the Budget Bureau of May 2, 1940, which tries to explain some of those broad generalities in the plans, it will look for that letter.

Third. The Reorganization Act requires that the terms of a reorganization plan be set out in the Statutes at Large and in the Federal Register. But it says nothing about the long explanatory interpretations from the Bureau of the Budget. So our air carrier will have to hunt up the letter somewhere else, and if there are any mimeographed copies left, it will probably get one.

Armed with these data our air carrier will go into the matter with its attorneys and start out rather bewildered to find which agency does what. First, the carrier will have to get a certificate of convenience and necessity from the Board. To do that it will have to prove that it is fit to operate between certain points. After it gets the certificate it will find that it must have a safety operating certificate. For that, under this plan, it must go to the Administrator and it must prove that it is fit to operate to certain points.

Two sets of witnesses under two different administrative heads to prove a single thing, both of them within the same Authority. Follow me.

For that purpose it will perhaps want to subpena some witnesses. Now, listen. It will look to the act to find that the power to subpena witnesses is given in title X. It will then read the Budget Bureau's letter and find that all the powers of title X shall be in the Board. So that although its hearing is before the Administrator it will have to go to the Board to get subpenas issued for the witnesses to testify before the Administrator. If the Board and the Administrator disagree about the fitness of the carrier to operate, the carrier can go nowhere except to the courts, and if it wants to appeal from a ruling of the Board, a specific appeal is given to it to the circuit court of appeals. But if it wants to appeal from a ruling of the Director, unless the Walter Act is passed, it has no appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, of course, I cannot even start through this in 2 minutes.

Then the carrier will examine the terms and conditions prescribed by the Board in its certificate of convenience and necessity and the terms prescribed by the Administrator in its operating certificate, to see if they are consistent. If they are, it can go ahead. If they are not, it is stymied again. And even after the Administrator acts, the Secretary of Commerce may step in and revise or overrule his action. The carrier will find that out if it happens to read Knight v. United States Land Association (142 U. S. 161).

When it starts to operate the carrier will have to examine some safety rules issued by the Board. Then it will have to check the terms in its operating certificate again to see if they conflict with those rules. If it thinks they do, it will go back, not to the Board, but back to the Administrator, and tell him that the terms prescribed by the Administrator conflict with the rules prescribed by the Board. Hurley-gurley, flippity-flop. [Laughter.] The carrier's lawyers will fumble in their brief cases until they find a mimeographed copy of the letter of the Bureau of the Budget, which says that the Administrator is to be bound by the rules of the Board, and the Administrator will reply that the reorganization plan set forth in the Statutes at Large, as required by the Reorganization Act, says no such thing, but simply gives him the power to issue safety operating certificates. There you go. Hurley-gurley of the worst kind.

I will not stand here and permit the President of the United States to be charged with this kind of knowledge. He does not know what is in this thing. You pass this reorganization bill and you are retarding the progress of aviation in the United States by 15 years, I bound you. [Applause.]

There is no more important, young, struggling industry today than that of aviation, and none more hazardous. I do not want for the Air Safety Board credit for saving all of these lives, but I do want it for the pilots and the Civil Aeronautics Authority, and I want them both let alone. I do not care what you do with the Safety Board, but you surely do not have to reorganize all of the Government to fire two men or abolish a board. [Applause.]

If, however, the Administrator believes that the Bureau of the Budget's mimeographed letter was correct, he will then have a hearing and argument before him to determine whether his terms in the certificate conflict with any rule made by the Board. After he reaches his decision the Secretary of Commerce can, of course, revise or overrule his decision.

Suppose he decides there is no conflict. That will not help the carrier, because if it violates a safety rule, it can be severely fined. To determine whether there is a conflict between the Administrator and the Board, it will have to go to the courts.

But finally—we hope—the carrier will begin to operate. It will again have to look to the safety rules of the Board to see how it should maintain its equipment. But it will have to deal with the Administrator's inspectors in trying to follow those rules.

Suppose the Administrator's inspectors and the carrier disagree about the meaning of the Board's rules. The carrier may suggest that they go to the Board to find out what the rules mean. But the inspectors will reply that they are under the direction of the Administrator. So the carrier will go back to the Administrator, and from him, perhaps, to the Secretary of Commerce.

Suppose they uphold their inspectors. The carrier will then, to protect itself, inform the Board that it is doing so-and-so as directed by the Administrator and the Secretary of Commerce. But the Board will reply that their rules mean what they say, and the Administrator and the Secretary of Commerce cannot revise them.

Again the carrier will have to go to court to get the conflict settled.

Now suppose the Board looks into the carrier's operations and decides that an operating certificate should not have been issued by the Administrator. It proposes to revoke the certificate. The carrier pleads that the Administrator issued the certificate as he was empowered to do. The Board replies that under the act it may revoke a certificate for any reason which in its judgment would justify a refusal to issue one in the first instance.

Again the carrier has to go to court to get the Administrator and the Board into line with each other.

Or suppose the Administrator decides to amend the certificate so that the carrier can no longer fly from A to B to C but must fly from A to B to D. The carrier starts flying to D. But then it hears from the Board that jurisdiction to revoke a certificate in whole or in part is vested in the Board and not the Administrator; that the Administrator's change was not a mere amendment but a revocation in part of the certificate; that therefore the carrier must continue to fly to C.

Again the carrier must go to court to get the matter straightened out.

Then suppose the carrier has an accident. The Board investigates it and blames the Administrator's faulty inspection. To protect himself the Administrator has his own inspectors investigate it and blames the Board's safety rule on minimum visibility. The Secretary of Commerce sustains the Administrator and says so. The Board announces that it is independent of the Secretary.

The next time the carrier has an accident there is a truce between the Board and the Administrator.

They both blame the pilot.

That is safe.

There will be no recrimination.

There will be no controversy.

Because the pilot is dead!

After a while our air carrier will go to another air carrier to find out how things were in the old days.

"In the old days," it will be told, "that is, B. R.—before reorganization—things were different. Things worked smoothly then."

"Didn't you have an Administrator then?" it will ask.

"Oh, yes," comes the reply. "But then the old Authority assigned administrative functions in regard to safety regulation to the Administrator and he had to perform them under the direction of the Authority. Then there was no question who had the power to tell us what to do. Then there was no conflict of power or division of responsibility."

"Another thing," the old air carrier will add. "In the old days, that is, B. R.—before reorganization—there was an Air Safety Board to investigate accidents. That Board had nothing to do except to find out what happened. It had no axes to grind, no responsibility to evade."

But that was all before reorganization.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. YOUNGDAHL].

Mr. YOUNGDAHL. Mr. Chairman, like many another measure before Congress, this proposal is a combination of a little bit of good and a lot of bad.

The general idea of a reorganization of the executive departments was granted to the Chief Executive, unless the Congress disapproved, under the plea of less cost and greater efficiency.

Neither of these aims, in my opinion, would be promoted by this fourth reorganization plan.

It is my desire, however, to confine my remarks to but two provisions of this plan, the transfer of the Civil Aeronautics Authority to the Department of Commerce and transfer of the enforcement provisions of the pure Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act from the Department of Agriculture to the Social Security Agency.

For years the aviation industry and development of this country was kicked from pillar to post. New regulations and new agencies were created, transferred, and killed and recreated.

Two years ago the Civil Aeronautics Authority was created with full authority to regulate and control aviation. That Authority took the place of a bureau in the Department of Commerce.

For the first time aviation was put on a secure footing, its problems handled with understanding and foresight, its regulations based upon sound knowledge of the best interests of aviation.

Commercial air-line aviation has just completed a full year with the outstanding record of not one passenger fatality. This record has been achieved under the guidance of the Civil Aeronautics Authority.

Ten thousand new civilian pilots are now completing their training with the amazing record of but one death to date. Not only that, but this enormous training program has been completed with a new record for low cost of instructional flight.

Now it is proposed to wipe out this Authority and return it to its former status of a bureau under the Department of Commerce, back to the place where it was such a failure 2 short years ago.

In my opinion, the Civil Aeronautics Authority is one of the outstanding independent agencies of our Government today. Its efficient management, intelligent regulations, and its record for safety and growth of aviation are outstanding.

To reduce such an independent agency to the status of a bureau under the budgetary control, if not coercion, of another department would be to again set back the sound growth and progress of aviation in this country. It would be a blow to the development of commercial aviation and an undermining of one of the most important defensive arms of our Nation.

The proposed transfer of the enforcement of the Pure Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act from the Department of Agriculture to the Social Security agency, in my opinion, not only is ill-advised but follows much the same pattern as the other transfer—demotion because it has proven its efficiency.

The Department of Agriculture has administered the pure Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act since its inception. It has done so with fairness and in a manner which has met the general approval of both manufacturer and consumer. It has the personnel and equipment to make the necessary analyses and to set the required standards, and in the determination of violations and other matters of enforcement much of the work has a direct relation to other activities of this Department.

Now, to transfer this enforcement activity to the Social Security agency is to rob this act of its years of successful and satisfactory enforcement experience to place it under the jurisdiction of an agency wholly unequipped to handle such enforcement.

Such a transfer, with all the best intentions in the world of all those concerned, cannot but be a step backward in the enforcement of one of our important protective statutes.

Mr. Chairman, I hope this House will express in no uncertain terms its disapproval of this fourth reorganization plan. [Applause.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS].

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I started to fly in 1916; flew overseas with the British and French; wrote a report for the Navy on the organization and operation of a naval air station; was Ohio's first director of aeronautics; have written articles on air law. I have not a dime's worth of aviation stock. I do not represent any aviation company. I am not even a qualified pilot any more, but I am not uninformed or gullible or selfish when I say to you, as seriously as I can, that defeat of plan IV is a fight to save lives. After 24 years of aviation experience and observation, I know that what aviation needs is expert, unbiased, unpolitical regulation and supervision in order to live, in order that those who fly may live. We have it now. We will not have it under plan IV.

The present C. A. A. set-up is unusual, and probably anathema to bureaucrats, for it provides for a division of executive, quasi-judicial, and inquisitorial powers and responsibilities. With its unparalleled practical success, this set-up should be duplicated in other departments rather than destroyed.

The Administrator is the executive for air-navigation facilities, developing and promoting 24,249 miles of civil airways, and surveying more, with a staff of 2,623.

The C. A. A., a 5-man independent quasi-judicial board with long terms, has a staff of 553 experts, inspectors, engineers, and so forth, for regulatory functions, for economic and safety supervision. In the past year they inspected and certified, as airworthy, 33,000 pilots, 12,000 aircraft, 32,000 students, 10,000 mechanics for ground duty. They had 345 formal docket cases before them. They grounded 48 pilots, recommended prosecutions of 15. If present trends hold we will have 10,000 pilots, 30,000 planes, 4,000,000 passengers in the next 2 years.

The Air Safety Board is another separate independent 3-man board to investigate accidents, to furnish an independent audit from a safety standpoint of the work of the Administrator and the C. A. A. It hires its own staff of 69 inspectors, engineers, and experts, has investigated 2,947 crashes, has made 115 formal air-safety recommendations.

Often there is not much left after an airplane accident. It takes an expert to find out what happened, and an independent and unbiased expert to tell what happened, but it is vital to air safety and progress to know what happened. Suppose the crash was caused by poor maintenance of a field or by a faulty beacon? Would the Administrator like that? Suppose it was caused by an unfit pilot who had just been certified by a C. A. A. inspector, or caused by a C. A. A. traffic regulation? Unbiased decisions in such cases require decisions made independent of C. A. A. and the Administrator.

That independence is destroyed by plan IV, under which the C. A. A. investigates itself, for the Air Safety Board is abolished, and the Department of Commerce hires the investigators, decides on pay, promotions, budget, and does the talking to the President and Congress. If that is independence, then Poland is still independent.

Others have told of the utterly astounding and unparalleled record of perfect safety the past year under the present C. A. A. set-up, with all air lines in the black, and with air-mail subsidy reaching the vanishing point. Whoever would change this set-up has the burden of proof. What are the reasons for change?

First. We are told it is to eliminate duplication; that the C. A. A. can investigate themselves and their inspectors can inspect themselves. This shows an utter failure to understand their functions. In our city we have a public prosecutor and a public defender. We could combine the two and let one man argue against himself, thus eliminating duplication, but only one with the omniscience complex of a petty bureaucrat or a dictator would claim that such an elimination of duplication would work.

Second. We are told it is for economy, will save two salaries, $15,000. In view of the 61,000 added to the pay roll since the first reorganization plan, I have little hope for economy; but if this is economy, then expect next a proposal to abolish judges and let people decide their own cases in the name of economy.

Third. We are told that it will "simplify the task of executive management." Those are the President's own words, and here we find the real reason for the shake-up. Why does the expert regulation of safety in flying need "executive management"? Why does aviation need a place at the Cabinet table any more than the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Civil Service Commission, Federal Trade Commission, or the Veterans' Administration? The answer is aviation does not need the politicians; the politicians want aviation. This shake-up is a shake-down.

Here is the history of "executive management" of aviation in the Department of Commerce since 1933. Five qualified men wanting the job, Ewing Mitchell, who knew nothing about it, was chosen because he delivered Missouri delegates at the right time in Chicago, and the five were put under him. Then the five started sparring for positions and to oust Mitchell, until finally he was let out. Then Monroe Johnson, "Rowboat" Johnson, was put in and three of the five were reshuffled and as farewell presents were given inspection trips to far countries, from which only two returned alive, and Fred Fagg, a fine air-law man, came and soon left when he found what "executive management" meant. Then came Denny Mulligan, and then Congress wiped out the hideous mess and created the independent C. A. A. The Copeland committee had reported that "aeronautics within the Department of Commerce today is a stepchild." It was executive management that cost the lives of 12 pilots and millions of dollars in the air-mail cancelation. It is executive management that put "Rowboat" Johnson in the I. C. C., no doubt to administer safety regulations for rowboats under the new transportation bill, in order to make a place for the one man out of the whole C. A. A. set-up who now says a good word for plan IV. Executive management—political manipulation—is exactly what aviation cannot stand.

Fourth. We are told that freedom of the C. A. A. is not abolished because the President says in his order that it shall exercise some of its present functions "independently of the Secretary of Commerce." When the Germans went into Norway the announcement was, "You're free from the British now. You're independent. Give three cheers for independence. Whoever doesn't cheer will be shot." If the C. A. A. is transferred to the Department of Commerce, you know what will happen to anyone in the C. A. A. who does not cheer for independence.

Fifth. We are told that, because the President's family travels constantly by air, he is interested in air safety. I sometimes wonder about that. I suppose they all think that they are experts because they ride. Years ago I hauled planeloads of politicians who thought they were experts in aviation just because they could go through bumpy weather without getting sick, and I know that interference of these nonflying experts, kiwi control, has hurt aviation immeasurably.

Sixth. We are told that the opposition to plan IV is selfish. At least no member of my family ever got $5,000 down payment on a Government Fokker contract.

There are men here today, however, who have a selfish interest, the pilots. They want to live, and I suppose that is selfish, but when the slogan of the transport pilots is "I don't want to be the nerviest pilot but the oldest pilot," that means safety for you and me and our families. They are fighting here because they know in detail, from past experience, what Department of Commerce control means. They have helped bury their comrades, they have seen trusting passengers pulled out of twisted wreckage—dead. That is why they call this a lobby to save lives. That is why we must defeat plan IV. [Applause.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW] such time as he may desire.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I represent the western terminus of three transcontinental air lines all of the personnel of which are opposed to this reorganization order. This terminus is the Union Air Terminal at Burbank, Calif. Safety in the air and on the air lanes is vitally important to these people not only because of the fact that they fly thousands of hours, but because flying is their bread and butter.

They are evidently quite satisfied with the present status of air-commerce regulation and safety controls. They are enthusiastic about it. They want no change.

As a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce I have been very greatly interested in aviation legislation. As one who on occasion makes use of air-transportation services I am vitally interested in air safety. In considering the proposed Reorganization Plan No. IV I have given considerable study to the development of civil aviation and the effect of Federal control upon it and submit to the House a statement prepared for my purposes of study and from which much information may be gleaned.

The statement follows:

I. BACKGROUND OF FEDERAL REGULATION OF AVIATION

The Air Commerce Act of 1926 (44 Stat. 568), providing for the encouragement and regulation of the use of aircraft in commerce by the Secretary of Commerce, was the first recognition by Congress of the need for Federal regulation of aviation. The act, which provided only for the safety regulation of air commerce and made no provision for the regulation of the economic aspects of the industry, defined "air commerce" as "transportation in whole or in part by aircraft of persons or property for hire, navigation of aircraft in furtherance of a business, or navigation of an aircraft from one place to another in the operation or the conduct of a business." Among the safety features of air commerce which Congress specifically charged the Secretary of Commerce with fostering and regulating were included the following: (1) Registration of aircraft; (2) rating of aircraft as to airworthiness; (3) examination and rating of airmen; (4) examination and rating of air-navigation facilities; (5) promulgation of air-traffic rules; (6) issuance, suspension, and revocation of certificates; (7) establishment of civil airways and navigation facilities; and (8) recommendations to the Secretary of Agriculture as to necessary meteorological service.

Amendments to the original act on February 28, 1929 (45 Stat. 1404), and June 19, 1934 (45 Stat. 1113), gave the Secretary of Commerce, in addition to certain other functions and certain legal powers in connection with the exercise of the responsibilities enumerated in the original law, the additional function of the investigation of accidents in civil air navigation. Broad legal powers, including the power to administer oaths, issue subpenas, take depositions, etc., were further granted as adjuncts in the exercise of this recognized aid to aviation safety.

The Aeronautics Branch of the Department of Commerce was subsequently changed to the Bureau of Air Commerce of the Department of Commerce and the regulation and the investigation aspects of air commerce were administered by this agency until the enactment of the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938, which repealed the Air Commerce Act of 1926, as amended, and created the offices of the Civil Aeronautics Authority, the Administrator of the Civil Aeronautics Authority, and the Air Safety Board. This latter act provided not only for the exercise by the Civil Aeronautics Authority of all safety regulation of air commerce, formerly exercised by the Secretary of Commerce under the Air Commerce Act, but also further provided for the regulation of all economic aspects of the industry. The investigation of accidents and related safety functions formerly exercised by the Secretary of Commerce in addition to his rule-making and regulatory functions, was placed in the Air Safety Board, which was made independent of the Authority and was consequently placed in a position of impartially weighing facts and determining responsibility.

As a natural consequence to this independence of action in connection with fact-finding activities, the right—and duty—was placed on the Air Safety Board of making recommendations to the Civil Aeronautics Authority, predicated on such independently made and unprejudiced investigations, which, in its opinion, would prevent the recurrence of similar accidents in the future.

Coordination of safety and economic rule-making and enforcement powers in one agency and of investigatory powers in another agency entirely independent of the other insofar as such investigatory functions were concerned was the result obtained by the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938.

II. STATISTICS ON AIR-CARRIER AND NON-AIR-CARRIER SAFETY

Attached hereto as appendices are the following detailed statistical data taken from the official statistical records of the United States Government which depict in detail the safety record of the various phases of American aviation from the time the first official statistics were maintained (January 1, 1927) to the present time:

Appendix 1. Fatal-accident statistics for domestic scheduled air-carrier operation from January 1, 1927, through April 15, 1940.

Appendix 2. Fatal-accident statistics for foreign scheduled air-carrier operation from January 1, 1927, through April 15, 1940.

Appendix 3. Fatal-accident statistics for domestic scheduled air-carrier operation for the last 20 months under the Department of Commerce (January 22, 1937, to August 22, 1938) and the first 20 months under the Civil Aeronautics Authority and the Air Safety Board (August 22, 1938, to April 22, 1940).

Appendix 4. Domestic air-carrier operation and accident statistics for the yearly periods March 27, 1937, to March 26, 1938, March 27, 1938, to March 26, 1939, and March 27, 1939, to March 26, 1940.

Appendix 5. Total accident statistics for non-air-carrier operations from January 1, 1927, through April 15, 1940.

The safety record of domestic scheduled air-carrier operation is depicted in Appendix 1 attached, in which it is to be noted that during the 11 years of regulation by the Department of Commerce that 116 accidents were experienced, resulting in the death of 148 crew members and 242 passengers—or an average of almost 11 accidents per year involving the death of 35 persons. Comparable statistics included in this appendix on the record of domestic air carriers since August 22, 1938, reveal that 3 fatal accidents have occurred during the 20-month existence of the Air Safety Board with a total of 4 crew and 12 passenger fatalities—or an average of 1.8 accidents per year with an average annual death of 9.6 persons. Such figures, though revealing in themselves a greatly improved safety trend under the Civil Aeronautics Act as compared with Department of Commerce regulation under the Air Commerce Act of 1926, as amended, reflect only the safety records in terms of years, and due to the steady increase in the number of miles flown by air carriers from 1927 through April 15, 1940, do not depict the full import of the increase in the safety of domestic air transportation during the periods involved. The true increase in safety can only be appreciated when consideration is given to the fact that the average of 11 accidents per year under the Department of Commerce occurred during an average annual yearly operation by the domestic air carriers of 45,787,138 revenue miles, while the average of 1.8 accidents per year since the creation of the Air Safety Board occurred during an annual yearly operation of approximately 84,000,000 miles, an average under the Air Safety Board of one-sixth as many accidents during nearly twice as many miles of flying.

Of further interest in this connection is the fact that the average death rate of 35 persons per year under the Department of Commerce occurred while the domestic air carriers were transporting an average of 592,525 revenue passengers per year, while the average death of 9.6 persons per year since the creation of the Air Safety Board was experienced while domestic air carriers were transporting an average of approximately 1,600,000 revenue passengers per year, an average under the Air Safety Board of about one-fourth as many persons killed while approximately 3 times as many persons were being transported.

As is further shown in the attached statistical data, an average of 1,191,812 miles were flown per fatality while the domestic air carriers were under the regulatory jurisdiction of the Department of Commerce, while an over-all average of 7,914,913 miles per fatality have been flown since the creation of the Air Safety Board—and, as shown in appendixes 1 and 4, a total of approximately 90,000,000 miles have been flown since March 26, 1939, without serious injury or death to a passenger or crew member.

The safety record of domestic air carriers during the 20 months' existence of the Air Safety Board as compared with the safety record of these carriers during the preceding 20 months under the Department of Commerce is depicted in appendix 3. It is particularly to be noted in this connection that the air carriers were operating substantially the same number of route miles during both periods, and, with but very few exceptions, were operating the same type of flying equipment and utilizing the same navigational aids and facilities. As therein indicated, the safety averages during these two comparable periods improved from 9 accidents under the Department of Commerce involving 83 deaths in 109,793,440 miles of flying while carrying 1,852,902 passengers, to a total of 3 accidents since the passage of the Civil Aeronautics Act, involving 16 deaths in 134,775,977 miles of flying while carrying 2,472,979 passengers—or an improvement in safety from an average in domestic air-carrier operation of a death every 7.2 days to a death every 37 days.

The crowning achievement in air transportation has, of course, been attained by domestic air carriers during the last 13 months, when scheduled aircraft operated by these carriers flew a total of approximately 90,000,000 miles carrying approximately 2,000,000 passengers without the injury or death of a single passenger—an all-time record of safety in any field of transportation.

III. NON-AIR-CARRIER FLYING

The impossibility of obtaining accurate statistics on number of miles flown by private or nonscheduled aircraft prevents the making of specific comparisons between the safety records of this type operation under the jurisdiction of the Department of Commerce and under the Civil Aeronautics Authority and Air Safety Board. It is to be noted, however, as detailed in appendix 5, that 309 accidents, involving 477 fatalities, occurred during the last 20 months under the Department of Commerce, while only 273 accidents, involving 421 fatalities occurred during the 20 months' existence of the Civil Aeronautics Authority and Air Safety Board. The full import of this increase in the safety of non-air-carrier flying is not revealed, however, until consideration is given to the fact that the 309 accidents under the Department of Commerce occurred while an approximate average of 20,000 pilots were flying an approximate average of 9,000 aircraft, and the 273 accidents under the Civil Aeronautics Authority and Air Safety Board occurred while an approximate average of 32,000 pilots were flying an approximate average of 12,000 aircraft.

IV. FUNCTIONS AND ORGANIZATIONS OF THE AIR SAFETY BOARD

The Air Safety Board, as has been previously stated, was created under title VII of the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938 (52 Stat. 973), which became effective on the 22d day of August 1938. Enumerated in such act were the following principal duties of the Air Safety Board:

(1) Make rules and regulations, subject to the approval of the Authority, governing notification and report of accidents involving aircraft;

(2) Investigate such accidents and report to the Authority the facts, conditions, and circumstances relating to each accident and the probable cause thereof;

(3) Make such recommendations to the Authority as, in its opinion, will tend to prevent similar accidents in the future;

(4) Make such reports and recommendatons public in such form and manner as may be deemed by it to be in the public interest; and

(5) Assist the Authority in ascertaining what will best tend to reduce or eliminate the possibility of, or recurrence of, accidents by investigating such complaints filed with the Authority or the Board, and by conducting such special studies and investigations on matters pertaining to safety in air navigation and the prevention of accidents as may be requested or approved by the Authority.

With the exception of four clerical employees, previously employed by the Department of Commerce in the performance of accident analyses and statistical work, the Air Safety Board had no staff of any kind to assist in the performance of its mandated functions and the organization of the Air Safety Board for the purpose of carrying out its independent investigatory functions had to be created in its entirety. Faced with the duty of performing efficiently duties of an emergency nature in all parts of the United States on a moment's notice, the Air Safety Board created a compact Washington organization consisting of but one division (including Investigation, Legal, Technical, and Analysis Sections) under an executive officer and a field organization of seven regional offices in New York, Atlanta, Chicago, Fort Worth, Kansas City, Los Angeles, and Seattle. Personnel in the regional offices varies from one to three investigators and enables the Board to reach the scene of any private or air-carrier accident in a comparatively brief period of time and at a minimum of expense. Aircraft are stationed in Washington and in each field office to facilitate the work of the investigators. The Washington and field personnel of the Board totals 78, including clerical and secretarial employees, which figure includes 56 employees in the Washington office and 22 employees in the field offices. The Board's entire staff was selected on the basis of the technical and professional qualifications of the personnel concerned, practically all of whom have civil-service status. The 1939 fiscal year appropriation of the Air Safety Board was $380,000, and the Independent Office Appropriation Act passed by Congress for the 1940–41 fiscal year provides an equal appropriation for this period. The Board, during its 20 months' existence, has reported to the Civil Aeronautics Authority, pursuant to section 702 (a) (2) of the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938, the facts, conditions, circumstances, and probable cause of approximately 2,000 accidents involving aircraft.

Predicated both on the investigations of individual accidents and the collective experience gained in a number of investigations, the Board, pursuant to section 702 (a) (3) of the act, has made a total of 115 recommendations to the Authority which, in the opinion of the Board, would prevent the recurrence of similar accidents to those on which such recommendations were based. These recommendations cover a wide scope. Some relate to regulatory procedure or practices of general application, and some to particular characteristics of particular aircraft or the status of particular personnel. They include recommendations as to the modification of the fuel system of an air-carrier aircraft, redesign of portions of the structure of a new type aircraft intended for air-carrier use; revocation of certificates of competency of personnel involved in an air-carrier accident; dispatching and operating procedures of domestic air carriers; the requirements for certification of pilots; the requirements for issuance of an instructor rating to pilots, and reexamination of the approved power ratings of certain engines used in air-carrier aircraft together with the present procedure employed in determining such ratings.

V. REORGANIZATION PLAN IV

In order to fully appreciate the significance and effect of the proposed abolition of the offices of the members of the Air Safety Board and the transfer of the functions of the Board to the Civil Aeronautics Board, under the Secretary of Commerce, it is necessary to consider briefly the background and history of the independence of the Air Safety Board and the status of the proposed organization set-up in the light of such background, as well as more recent history.

Prior to the passage of the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938 the Secretary of Commerce had complete control of American aviation in all its varied phases. He approved the specifications and granted the type certificate for the manufacture of aircraft, aircraft engines, propellers, and component parts; he set the standards for aircraft airworthiness; he prescribed standards for issuance of certificates of competency for airmen; he established air-navigation facilities; he inspected and approved aircraft as to airworthiness; he granted certificates of competency to pilots and he promulgated air-traffic rules. And then, when something went wrong with the aircraft, engine, air-navigation facility, or airman he had approved and an accident occurred, frequently involving the destruction of aircraft and the death of pilot and passengers, it was he who investigated the accident and ascertained where the responsibility lay for the cause of the accident. In short, he was the prosecutor, judge, and jury of aviation, and was in a position of setting the standards and then passing on whether or not his own actions had any part in the cause of accidents or in any way were to blame for their tragic result.

That this mode of accident investigation was functioning in an unsatisfactory manner was common knowledge over a period of years, and in 1936 Congress saw fit to itself investigate the activities of the Department of Commerce in connection with the investigation and circumstances surrounding the air-carrier accident in Missouri on May 6, 1935, which resulted in the death of Senator Cutting of Arizona. (The Senate resolution in this regard is attached hereto as appendix 6.) The demand of the public and the demand of Congress for an independent and impartial investigation of accidents; the ascertainment of the true cause of the accident; the placing of the blame where the blame actually lay; and the making of recommendations which would prevent the recurrence of such accidents became so strong that in the enactment of the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938, the Air Safety Board—a three-man agency, a part of the Civil Aeronautics Authority, but entirely independent of the authority insofar as its investigatory functions were concerned, was created.

Subsequent to the establishment of the Air Safety Board, on August 22, 1938, the investigation of accidents and other related safety activity have continued as a function independent of the Federal regulation of civil aviation. Accidents have been investigated and the facts, conditions, circumstances, and probable cause thereof reported to the Civil Aeronautics Authority pursuant to law; and 115 recommendations have been made by the Air Safety Board to the Civil Aeronautics Authority predicated on such accident investigations which, in the opinion of the Air Safety Board, would increase the safety of air transportation. The marked increase in the safety of private flying since the creation of the Air Safety Board, and the operation by domestic air carriers of some 90,000,000 miles of scheduled flying during the last 13 months without so much as injuring a passenger, reflect conclusively the effectiveness of the work of the Air Safety Board.

In Reorganization Plan III, submitted by the President to the Congress on April 2, 1940, transfer of functions from the Civil Aeronautics Authority to the Administrator of Civil Aeronautics was incorporated, which placed the entire inspection staff of the Civil Aeronautics Authority under the jurisdiction and control of the Administrator, who, under section 7 (c) of Reorganization Plan IV is to administer his functions "under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of Commerce."

Turning now to the proposals as contained in Reorganization Plan No. IV submitted to the Congress by the President of the United States it is to be noted that section 7 (a) of this plan transfers the Civil Aeronautics Authority and its functions, the office of the Administrator of Civil Aeronautics and its functions, and the functions of the Air Safety Board to the Department of Commerce. In section 7 (b) the functions of the Air Safety Board are consolidated with the functions of the Civil Aeronautics Authority, hereafter to be known as the Civil Aeronautics Board, and which, in addition to its other functions, will "discharge the duties heretofore vested in the Air Safety Board so as to provide for the independent investigation of aircraft accidents." A further proviso of the plan is that "the offices of the members of the Air Safety Board are abolished." Section 7 (c), among other things, provides that the functions of the Administrator of Civil Aeronautics shall be administered "under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of Commerce" and that the Civil Aeronautics Board shall report to Congress and the President, through the Secretary of Commerce, and "shall exercise its functions of rule making (including the prescribing of rules, regulations, and standards), adjudication, and investigation independently of the Secretary of Commerce. Budgeting, accounting, personnel, procurements, and related routine management functions of the Civil Aeronautics Board are to be performed under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of Commerce through such facilities as he shall designate or establish."

With relation to investigation of accidents and related safety activities of the Air Safety Board, described by the President in the transmittal of Reorganization Plan No. IV as "the important work of accident investigation heretofore performed by the Air Safety Board," it is to be noted that several very definite results will be obtained in the event the proposed Reorganization Plan No. IV becomes effective. First, the functions of the prosecutor, judge, and jury, i. e., rule making, adjudication, and investigation will once more be embodied in one regulatory agency, an administrative organization set-up identical with that which existed under the Bureau of Air Commerce of the Department of Commerce and which Congress saw fit to first investigate and then change only 2 years ago. Secondly, the Reorganization Plan by its own terms places mandatory functions on the Civil Aeronautics Board which are inconsistent in their nature, i. e., the "independent" and impartial investigation of aircraft accidents in addition to exercising the rule-making and adjudication functions incident to the Federal regulation of the safety and economic aspects of aviation. Third, the degree of control to be exercised by the Secretary of Commerce over the investigatory, rule making, and other functions of the Civil Aeronautics Board by virtue of the "direction and supervision" of the "budgeting, accounting, personnel, procurement, and related routine management functions of the Civil Aeronautics Board" granted to the Secretary of Commerce by Reorganization Plan IV is—to say the least—left in a state of confusion. Fourth, the Civil Aeronautics Board and the Administrator of Civil Aeronautics will both be placed in the position of having to pass judgment on their own responsibilities. It is to be particularly noted in this connection that in no other field of transportation does the Federal Government have so active a part in the actual physical operation of the carriers as is true in the field of air transportation. The establishment of standards, certification of airmen and aircraft, establishment of air traffic rules, operation of air traffic control, construction, maintenance, and operation of air navigation facilities are included in the functions of the Civil Aeronautics Authority and the Administrator, and, though somewhat shifted, would remain as functions of the Civil Aeronautics Board and the Administrator of Civil Aeronautics under the reorganization plans now before the Congress.

The necessity, therefore, of the technical and field staff of the Administrator having to investigate and report on accidents and safety matters, which of necessity involve and therefore reflect on the caliber of their own activity or on the functioning of the navigation facilities which they establish, maintain, and operate, and of the Authority, in the exercise of its "independent investigation functions" mandated by Reorganization Plan IV, having to pass on the sufficiency or correctness of standards set or actions previously taken in the exercise of its "rule-making and adjudication functions," can be readily seen. It is obvious that such assignment of responsibility and division of functions therein outlined is predicated on the assumption that personnel of the Administrator and Civil Aeronautics Board in the exercise of "independent investigation functions" can divorce themselves from other responsibilities, and objectively pass judgment on such other activity and its relationship to a particular matter under consideration. That such a predicate, regardless of the effort expended, or mental honesty of individuals concerned, is contrary to human nature, and would place personnel of the Administrator and Civil Aeronautics Board in a very unfair position, goes without saying, and the hesitancy on the part of the public to accept the findings of a Federal regulatory agency for aviation as to its own functions or responsibilities for an aircraft accident, regardless of the facts of the case, when question exists as to such responsibility in connection with the accident, has been demonstrated on numerous occasions between 1927 and the present. Absolute independence of entity and action has been shown by both history and experience to be the most expeditious and efficient—if not the only—way in which aircraft accidents can be investigated, and causes ascertained and eliminated as future hazards to aviation, and, at the same time, the confidence and morale of the regulatory agency, the industry, and public maintained and protected.

Reorganization Plan IV, insofar as air transportation safety is concerned, means, in short, that with but a very questionable saving of expense to the Government, a Federal regulatory and investigatory system which has effected such marked increases in air safety in the 20 months of its existence and established a safety record never before equalled by any mode of transportation, will be junked, and the system which Congress only 20 months ago found to be so unsatisfactory as to demand its abolition, and the enactment of the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938, will be again brought to life.

UNITED STATES SENATE RESOLUTION

Whereas an airplane owned by Transcontinental Western Air, Inc., while engaged in interstate air commerce was wrecked near Macon, in the State of Missouri, on the 6th day of May 1935, resulting in the death of five persons, among whom was an honored Member of this body, Hon. Bronson M. Cutting; and

Whereas it is imperative that life and property transported through interstate air commerce should be accorded the greatest degree of safety obtainable through the use of every reasonable safeguard; and

Whereas it is essential, in order to protect life and property in transportation through the air, that a thorough and searching inquiry should be made into the causes of the wreck referred to and into the efforts, if any, for the prevention of accidents of like character, and the safeguards, if any, provided both by the companies engaged in interstate air commerce and the precautions and safeguards, if any, required by governmental agencies; and

Whereas such investigation and the knowledge to be derived therefrom are necessary to enable the Congress to adopt legislation for the protection of life and property by air transportation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce, or a subcommittee thereof, be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate fully and thoroughly the said wreck of the airplane owned by Transcontinental Western Air, Inc., which occurred on the 6th day of May 1935 near Macon, in the State of Missouri, and any other accidents or wrecks of airplanes engaged in interstate air commerce in which lives have been lost; and to investigate fully and thoroughly interstate air commerce, the precautions and safeguards provided therein, both by those engaged in such interstate air transportation and by officials or departments of the United States Government; and to investigate fully and thoroughly the activities of those entrusted by the Government with the protection of property and life by air transportation, and the degree, adequacy, and efficiency of supervision by any agency of Government, including inspection and frequency thereof, and to take testimony in all aspects in relation to any of the matters herein indicated and in relation to any subject related thereto; be it further

Resolved, That the said Committee on Commerce, or the subcommittee thereof appointed for the purpose, shall determine what legislation, if any, shall be adopted in the interest of safety of life and property transported in interstate air commerce, and what legislation, if any, shall be adopted to prevent accidents in the air and to provide appropriate safeguards for their prevention; and be it further

Resolved, That for the purposes of this resolution such committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold hearings, sit, and act at such times and places during the sessions or recesses of the Senate during the Seventy-fourth and succeeding Congresses, until a final report is submitted; to employ such counsel, experts, clerical, stenographic, and other assistance, and to require, by subpena or otherwise, the attendance of witnesses, the production of books, papers, and documents, to administer oaths, take testimony, and make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of such committee, not to exceed the sum of $10,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. VREELAND] such time as he may desire.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this resolution.

On the night of May 3 the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] made a speech over the radio in support of the proposed reorganization of the Civil Aeronautics Authority.

He said that there are selfish interests opposing the reorganization. But those who oppose are the pilots, the mechanics, the radio operators, the dispatchers, the American Federation of Labor. Their selfish interest is to preserve their lives and the lives of their passengers. The industry unanimously opposes it, including not only the air lines but also the insurance underwriters and the air express company and the manufacturers. Their selfish interest is the protection of the lives of their employees and their passengers and the investment which has been attracted into this industry since the C. A. A. was set up. The private flyers oppose it. Their selfish interest is the protection of their own lives and the lives of the students they are teaching to fly. All these interests may be selfish. But it is a selfishness which is seeking greater security, greater safety, greater efficiency, in a civil-aviation industry that must be as safe as human hand and mind can make if it is to be the strong, sure backlog for our national defense which we so desperately need.

Then the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] said that the President is interested in aviation and so would not do anything to make it unsafe or harm it. But the fact of the matter seems to be that the President, a busy man, was given a plan, worked out after superficial study by some bureaucrats in a division of the Bureau of the Budget who knew nothing about aviation, without consultation with the Authority. And then the plan was so badly worded that recently the Budget has been compelled to go to the Attorney General and get his approval to a long, involved, complicated letter to the Authority trying to explain all the ambiguous phrases in the plans themselves. The Budget Bureau has had to take two or three bites at this thing, and still does not have it clearly explained. The fact of the matter is that the President was badly advised by people who are not experts in the field of aviation and who have given the matter no such careful and thorough study as did the gentleman from California, Representative LEA, and the other members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce when the Civil Aeronautics Authority was created.

Then the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] said that the President was within his rights in proposing this reorganization because Congress defeated an amendment to the Reorganization Act which would have exempted the C. A. A. But note what was said on the floor of the House when that amendment was being debated. On March 8, 1939, at page 3513 of the RECORD, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] himself said that those concerned about the continuance of the Authority need have no fear because—

> Can anyone imagine that the President is going to abolish or cripple an agency of this character in which he himself is so greatly interested? * * * We all know the value that is going to come as a result of the Safety Board and the leadership of the Authority. * * * [The President] can add to the duties of the Authority, and I predict he will do it rather than in any way impede the progress that is being made.

That is what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] said just before the amendment to exempt the Authority was rejected. But what has the President done? He has not done what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] said. Instead of adding to the powers of the Authority he has abolished the present Authority and made it into a new subordinate board in the Department of Commerce. He has stripped it of vital powers of safety regulation. He has completely abolished the Air Safety Board. He has made the Authority into a dependent appendage of the Department of Commerce. Maybe the President is within his rights. But he did not do what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] said he was going to do.

Next the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] says that the abolition of the Air Safety Board does not mean that independent accident investigation will not be continued. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] says that the present Air Safety Board cannot translate its findings into action by making rules and regulations. That is true. That is why the Air Safety Board was set up. It was set up to do nothing but investigate accidents so that it would have no interest in the investigation except to get at the facts, and find out what is wrong, without fear or favor. That is what the Director of the old Bureau of Air Commerce admitted before the Senate Committee on Commerce was needed so badly. That is what we need if we are to have real investigations instead of whitewashings. Someone must investigate who will not want to blame the dead pilot and obscure the facts in order to hide his own bungling. But the reorganization abolishes the Safety Board, and gives to the rule-making Board the duty of investigating itself.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] also said that there is $108,000,000 spent on civil aviation every year and that the President ought to know from a Cabinet officer regularly what is being done with this money. Therefore the Authority ought to be put into the Department of Commerce. But the expenditure of all but about $30,000,000 of that sum is already under Cabinet officers of the Work Projects Administration, which is the same as being under a Cabinet officer, because that sum, as shown by the Budget Bureau's report printed in the New York Times on the morning of May 4, is made up of the money spent on W. P. A. airport projects, the Weather Bureau under the Department of Agriculture, and the expenditures of the Post Office Department, over and above the money spent by the C. A. A. As to the money spent by the C. A. A., why should it be put into a department? There was Cabinet representation for civil aviation before 1938. What good did it do? It left a trail of wrecked airplanes, dead passengers, and bankrupt companies.

Finally the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] said that Mr. J. Monroe Johnson, the present Assistant Secretary of Commerce, is being moved out and a new one can be appointed who will know all about civil aviation. And Saturday we read the President's announcement that he would "probably" appoint the present Chairman of the Authority to that post. This is a bare-faced admission that it is not intended to permit the Authority to continue as an independent agency. This is a bare-faced admission that the regulation and development of civil aviation will henceforward depend upon the changing personalities holding the office of Secretary and Assistant Secretary. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] himself said in his speech that the Assistant Secretary "would probably be directly in contact with civil aeronautics." Indeed, he would. And who will be the Assistant Secretary next year or the year after? Instead of having an independent Authority, with fixed terms of office, removable only for cause, we will once again be returned to a system where political appointees of varying character and competence will be the men in ultimate control. That was the system that nearly wrecked civil aviation under the Department of Commerce before 1938. That was the system we put an end to when we adopted the Civil Aeronautics Act and created the C. A. A. There should be no return to that system.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] closed his speech with another reference to the "selfish interest" opposing reorganization. Earlier he referred to the small group of air-line pilots who have come to Washington to protest the reorganization. That small group represents every air-line pilot in the country. They may be selfish. Who would not want to save his own life? If that is selfish, it is the strongest possible appeal to the Congress of this Nation to respond with an overwhelming vote of confidence in the Civil Aeronautics Authority as it exists today, free and independent. [Applause.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAN ZANDT].

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, for a few moments I would like to have the attention of the Committee to discuss that part of the President's fourth Government reorganization plan concerning the transfer of the State nautical schools from the Navy Department to the Maritime Commission.

At the present time there are four State nautical schools located in Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, and California. Each of these schools trains young men for the United States Naval Reserve and for the American merchant marine. These schools are part of the State educational systems but are subsidized by the Federal Government. Twenty percent of the cost of maintenance is assumed by the cadet and paid in the form of tuition; 40 percent paid by the Navy; and the remaining 40 percent by the respective State.

In addition to the expense of maintenance, the Navy Department assumes the cost of an annual overhaul of the ships in a navy yard. Each of the ships now being used is the property of the United States Navy, being loaned to the State nautical schools. These ships are based at navy yards throughout the year, and since they are Navy ships in reserve, the moment war is declared the State commission pennant is hauled down and replaced by a naval commission pennant, thus placing the vessel in active service of the United States Navy. These ships in time of war, as part of the United States Navy, are potential flagships for the offshore patrol and may be found guarding harbor nets, mine areas, and so forth.

In other words, at this very moment these vessels have an assignment with the United States Navy in time of war. The sole reason for the existence of these State nautical schools and the ships they use is for national-defense purposes. As already explained, the ships have a definite assignment in time of war. The captain and his crew are all Naval Reservists, while every cadet is a member of the Naval Reserve. The entire crew, including cadets, are trained for war duties through a systematic and detailed course of instruction similar to that in effect at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis.

The Maritime Commission, I am told, knew nothing about this proposed transfer of the State nautical schools. As a matter of fact, let me read you a portion of the Commission's letter dated July 29, 1939, to Chairman BLAND, of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, in which they said:

> The Maritime Commission believes that the State nautical schools should be brought under the supervision, at least to a limited degree, of the Commission so as to integrate them with its training program.

The Navy Department apparently knows nothing about the proposed transfer, since they state in a letter to Chairman BLAND dated October 24, 1939:

> The Navy Department considers that the interests of national defense, with particular regard to the training of prospective merchant-marine officers and their enrollment in and qualification for the Naval Reserve, are best served by the retention of Navy Department control over the State nautical schools.

The opinion of the heads of the several State nautical schools supports the position of the Navy. For instance, I quote Mr. G. Coe Farrier, chairman of the Pennsylvania State Nautical Schoolship Committee, who, under date of April 19, 1940, stated:

> Such transfer would operate to bring about the discontinuance of State maintenance of such schools, and that lacking the initiative given to such activities by local interests, the standards of merchant marine officers would be lowered and their value to shipowners and operators decreased. Speaking for myself, I believe that any such transfer would destroy the esprit de corps of the entire training service and could only result in a deterioration of the quality of the future crop of junior merchant marine officers.

Mr. Clarence E. Perkins, chairman of the Massachusetts State Nautical School, takes a strong position against the transfer of these ships to the Maritime Commission in a letter dated May 6, 1940, when he said in part:

> We believe that the interests of national defense, with particular regard to the training of prospective merchant marine officers and their enrollment in and qualification for the Naval Reserve, will best be served by the retention of Navy Department control over the State nautical schools. We do not believe this control should be abandoned in favor of some untried program.

Speaking for the California Maritime Academy, Robert H. Fouke, chairman of the board, in a wire dated May 6, 1940, states:

> All State nautical schools, including ours, oppose transfer ships, funds, supervision, Navy training from Navy Department to Maritime Commission.

When it is all said and done, everyone connected with the State nautical schools, speaking from years of experience, vigorously oppose any such transfer of these schools from the Navy to the Maritime Commission.

In a few words, I am asking support of the Lea resolution which will nullify the President's fourth Government reorganization plan, thus permitting the State nautical schools, which are a part of our national defense and manned by Naval Reservists, to remain under the supervision and control of the Navy Department. [Applause.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG].

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, I approach this discussion in a thoroughly dispassionate manner. When the Civil Aeronautics Authority was created it came from a first-class committee of this body and was created by this Congress after full and complete discussion at both ends of this Capitol. The consideration given this measure by the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of this House was full and complete. The record of efficiency already set up and established is evidence enough that the representative branch of this Government accepting a recommendation from the Chief Executive had worked well when it created the C. A. A.

The past history of aviation and its struggles in this country cannot be encompassed in the 2 minutes of time at my disposal. For my part, Mr. Chairman, having ridden many miles in airplanes since 1916 across this country in almost every direction, and knowing something about both the formation of commercial air lines and the development of the military and naval air service I feel it a part of my duty to rise in opposition to the proposed reorganization plan now before this body. I do this because I am sure that at a later date if the operation of the Civil Aeronautics Authority can be improved upon at least the Chief Executive should be given more time to consider his recommendations before sending them up to the Congress. I feel that we have worked well and I am willing to stand by our own creation, which has served us well. I hope the Congress will do likewise. [Applause.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 11 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE].

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, as one of the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce which drafted the aviation bill, and as one of the conferees on the same bill, I am opposing Reorganization Plan No. IV. Let us here analyze why these gentlemen who have spoken in favor of this plan say it should be adopted. The Authority itself. No cause for complaint against it. No cause for complaint against the Administrator. They all come back to the Safety Board. Here is the only opposition.

From one of the Members we hear the Safety Board has been a terrible thing, that it has been filthy and foul. By another one we are told that they have not done anything at all. Now let us see about that just a minute.

The President of the United States, and I take his word for it, in a letter to the Chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Authority dated March 21, 1940, has the following to say:

Certificate of special commendation presented to the Civil Aeronautics Authority—

That includes all branches of it—

United States of America, in recognition of the inspiring leadership, the inflexible determination that safety should come first, the spirit of sincere cooperation that contributed so much to the establishment of an outstanding record in safe transportation.

Then the certificate was presented. That was on March 21. It is strange, is it not, that the President of the United States never sent a message to the Congress to ask that the law be amended in any respect whatever if he had known of these things, that the gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from Missouri have spoken about. Nor has the President sent any message to Congress concerning the Civil Aeronautics Authority.

Mr. Chairman, who comprises the Authority? Robert H. Hinckley, Harllee Branch, Oswald Ryan, G. Grant Mason, Jr., and Edward Warner. On the 6th day of January the Authority sent to every Member of the House the first annual report of the Civil Aeronautics Authority, and when they spoke of the Safety Board they spoke very highly of it. It is said by some that it has done nothing. Let us see about that:

From August 22, 1938 (the date upon which the Air Safety Board assumed office), to October 31, 1939, the Board has dealt with a total of 2,668 accidents involving aircraft. It should be pointed out, however, that because of the all-inclusive definition heretofore given to the term "aircraft accident" many of these cases involved nothing more than minor mishaps. Only 8 percent of this seemingly large number of aircraft accidents resulted in fatal injury to persons and only 17 percent in the complete destruction of the aircraft involved. The investigation of 1,935 of these accidents has been completed by the Board, the remainder being still under consideration. A final report to the Authority has been made in 1,135 of them.

Sixty-eight of the total number of accidents reported occurred in scheduled air-carrier operation, of which 5 involved fatal injuries to passengers and 7 complete destruction of the aircraft. In addition to this total of 68 accidents, 1,120 mechanical interruptions to air-carrier service were reported to the Board involving failure of an engine or structural part of the aircraft, but not resulting in other damage or injury to persons. In connection with 5 of the air-carrier accidents, the Board ordered and held extensive public hearings.

The remaining 2,600 of the total accidents reported to the Board during this period included those occurring in noncommercial operation and nonscheduled commercial service. Of this number, 209 involved fatal injuries and 181 serious injuries to persons and 448 resulted in complete destruction of the aircraft. In 2 of these cases the Board conducted public hearings in connection with the investigation of the accidents, one involving a multimotored aircraft being operated in nonscheduled commercial service and the other a multimotored aircraft designed for scheduled air-carrier operation, but being flown experimentally at the time of the accident.

Members of the Authority appeared before the Appropriations Committee. Nothing was mentioned of any trouble with or in the Safety Board.

The gentlemen who favor this reorganization plan say that Hinckley, Branch, Ryan, and men of that type would hide this stuff that has been going on and would come before the Congress and say it is all right. Oh, no. You cannot make me believe that at all. The President and others concerned would not attempt to cover all the troubles up. No one can make me believe that they would.

The truth of the matter is I do not know why this is being done. I want to give you, however, a brief history of the C. A. A. Only 2 years ago the bill creating the Civil Aeronautics Authority was passed by the House, and 2 weeks later the report of the conferees came in and was agreed to. But the chairman of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the gentleman from California, CLARENCE LEA, for nearly a year beforehand had worked with the interdepartmental committee on this subject. The interdepartmental committee, the President, and others were very much interested in this matter. Upon one occasion the President called Senator MCCARRAN, author of the bill in the Senate, and the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA], author of the bill in the House, to come to the White House, at which time he told them he approved Senator MCCARRAN's plan of having a separate commission for the Authority. [Applause.] The President not only did that, but I went to the White House twice and I saw him twice. I saw Mr. James Roosevelt once. The President approved of a separate commission, because if he had not he would not have had to sign the bill on final passage. He did approve it.

Why has this been done? Why all this talk about the Safety Board? They wanted some goat to hang something on, so they brought up the Safety Board. I do not know what it has done, but as a Member of Congress, and as a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I know that not one single, solitary soul from the administration or otherwise has appeared before the committee asking for an amendment to the act. Like a bolt out of the clear sky, this thing comes up in the form of Reorganization Plan No. IV. Then we are lectured and told that it is a terrible thing for Democrats on this side to oppose the President. Oh, no. Mr. Chairman, after all is said and done there may be defects in the law that we passed. We can amend it. Remember that the Civil Aeronautics Authority is the arm of this Congress to take care of civil aviation in the United States. It is the arm of this Congress which passes upon the rates to be charged, just as the Interstate Commerce Commission is the arm of this Congress. They both report to the Congress and both are required to report to the Congress. As our aviation agency, I appeal to you, let us preserve it as such. Let us not go back to the days before we had the Authority. You know the trouble we had then. There is not a man in this House who served at that time who did not talk with disparagement at the way it was run. It was under three or four separate commissions at that time. So I say to you, when the vote comes tomorrow, let us remember that we created this agency and that we can change it to suit ourselves, but let us keep it. Let us keep it as our agency to report to the Congress and you will find that we have done right. [Applause.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] such time as she may desire.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I believe if this reorganization plan goes through, a tragedy may well take place, just as misinformation given the President caused him to make a terrible mistake in 1934. In 1934, through poor advice and obviously a complete lack of understanding of the situation, he took away the carrying of the air mail from the commercial pilots and turned it over to Army pilots, who did not have the proper equipment for carrying mail, especially during the winter months, through the snow and hail and blizzards. Many of you here today were not in Congress in 1934, but the horror and tragedy caused by those unnecessary deaths were known to you through the press and the radio. A few minutes ago I asked the gentleman from Missouri to yield for a question. I reminded him that in 1934, on March 9, the administration adjourned the House in just 13 minutes rather than permit me to speak to my resolution to stop the carrying of the air mail by the Army pilots. Later the President realized he had been misinformed, and rescinded his order for the carrying of the mail, but only after a score of lives had been lost. Since that time we have come far in the progress of commercial aviation, and the fact that in the last more than 400 days the Civil Aeronautics Authority can report no accident speaks volumes for the efficiency of the work that has been accomplished by them. To be sure, they have worked in cooperation with other people, but why not leave the Civil Aeronautics Authority to function as it is now functioning? Do not take a chance, I beg of you, to return to a system that did not prove so efficient. I believe the President has had misinformation in this case, just as he did in 1934. I am sure he will be grateful to us in saving him from making another error with tragic consequences. Many of us in the House have flown all over the country and been in the air for hours and hours. Many of us have done everything in our power to make aviation less hazardous. We know what the record has been for the past hundreds of days. Let us not take a chance of undoing the great accomplishment. For every reason we should make flying practical and safe. [Applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BEAM].

Mr. BEAM. Mr. Chairman, I am sure there is not a Member in this Chamber who questions the sincerity of purpose or the earnest desire of the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE], who just preceded me, to see aviation prosper and advance.

I am certain that his anxiety and eagerness to give this Nation the greatest aviation service in the history of the world can only be equaled by his personal desire to see the Congress of the United States perform its duty in the statesmanlike manner he has just described.

I feel, however, that there is a great deal of confusion and misunderstanding relative to the interpretation of Reorganization Plan No. IV. I have listened attentively to the Members who have preceded me, particularly the gentlemen who are opposed to this plan, and I have not heard a word of criticism against any other of the points involved in this reorganization plan. No gentleman who has disapproved of Reorganization Plan No. IV has commented on the various improvements and changes which are made with regard to the Department of State.

No gentleman who has spoken against this plan has made any references to the advancement made in the Treasury Department by this proposed reorganization. Not a word of criticism was advanced of the changes made in the Department of Justice for the betterment of the American people. Not a word of criticism was raised to the advances made by this reorganization plan in the reorganization of the Post Office Department and, likewise, the Department of the Interior. No word of criticism was spoken about the various changes and modifications suggested in the Department of Labor for the benefit of the citizens of the United States.

Did anyone opposed to this plan stand in the Well of the House and make any constructive criticism with regard to the changes made in the United States Maritime Commission or the Federal Security Agency? No, Mr. Chairman; not one word was uttered in respect to these proposals because they realize these changes are for the advancement and progress of governmental business, and for the best interest of the people of the Nation.

Mr. Chairman, everyone who spoke in opposition to the contemplated changes directed their arguments to section 7—transfer of the Civil Aeronautics Authority.

There is not a person in this Chamber who listened to the speech of the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN], and the uncontradicted facts and circumstances which he presented to the committee, who would not be convinced that because of the interdepartmental discord and dissension, ever present in the Air Safety Board, that it was in the best interests of the progress of aviation that the changes be brought about, as suggested.

Likewise no one could hear the sound and logical reasons advanced by the distinguished chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], without arriving at the same conclusion.

These changes as proposed will result in broader advances in the field of aviation; resulting in greater efficiency and safety for men who fly the airplanes; and added protection for passengers who travel the air lanes of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, $600,000,000 has been invested in the aviation industry, and before the conclusion of this year there will be invested upward of $1,000,000,000.

Does anyone believe for a single, solitary minute that this reorganization plan would endanger lives or would imperil the capital invested in this industry? It is a fallacy, it is a mirage, it is a snare and a delusion when they say they want to defeat this proposal merely on a pretense of saving lives. We are all interested in saving lives. The development this industry has made over the years will be augmented and enlarged, because it will be under the supervision of the Department of Commerce, and will have a voice in the council chambers of the executive branch of the Nation.

The Civil Aeronautics Board shall exercise its functions of rule making, including the prescription of rules, regulations, and standards, adjudication and investigation, independently of the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. Chairman, this is simply an attempt to embarrass the President of the United States and the administration in perfecting further developments in an industry which is destined to become one of the greatest in the world, and one which will have at all times the hearty cooperation of the Government of the United States in keeping America foremost in development, safety, and progressive ideals for this great enterprise. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired; all time has expired.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 60

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Congress does not favor the Reorganization Plan No. IV transmitted to Congress by the President on April 11, 1940.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the concurrent resolution back to the House, with the recommendation that the concurrent resolution be agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ROMJUE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the Committee having had under consideration the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 60), had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the concurrent resolution do pass.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent agreement heretofore entered into, the vote on the concurrent resolution will come the first thing tomorrow, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's desk.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a few excerpts therein.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House may have 5 legislative days within which to extend their own remarks on the concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, after consulting with the gentleman from California [Mr. HAVENNER] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM], it has been decided that the rules with respect to the fairs will not be called up this afternoon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert certain tables and telegrams as an extension of the remarks I made today in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks made today a letter written by Mr. Wayne Carpenter to Senator MCCARRAN.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

[Mr. VAN ZANDT addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix of the RECORD.]

Mr. VAN ZANDT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and to include therein certain data.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein certain excerpts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. PAGÁN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on Puerto Rico and the sugar legislation pending in Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Puerto Rico?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order of the House heretofore entered, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] is recognized for 1 hour.

AMENDMENT OF THE HATCH BILL

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I am under a very great temptation this afternoon, but I am not going to yield to it. A number of the newspapers have been saying a lot of things about me recently in connection with this Hatch bill. Thus far I have said nothing. They have gone as far as they could go day after day trying to make the country believe that I am a crook or a slicker. I do not say they have lied; they may have been mistaken; whether they have lied or are mistaken will depend on whether or not they correct what they have been saying when they check up on the facts which I am about to state.

I am going to make a statement now as to exactly what has happened in the Committee on the Judiciary with regard to the Hatch bill—and, by the way, with regard to the secret proceedings, I will venture that my newspaper friends, some of them, at least, who have been so concerned about this executive proceeding, if the committee had voted about 3 to 1 in executive session to have brought out the Hatch bill, we would have been a great bunch of statesmen. I think that is a fairly safe statement.

Now, let us see what happened. The Committee on the Judiciary had the Hatch bill under consideration for a long time. As chairman of the committee I thought it was about time I should find out just what the committee had in its mind with regard to that bill, in order that we could determine how we should proceed with reference to it. We had read it and carefully considered it, and were getting ready to see whether we wanted to amend it or not. So I had the bright idea, which does not seem to have been so bright now, of instead of asking each one of the members how he felt about it, so that I could determine whether or not the committee should spend more time in the consideration of the bill, we already having had the bill under discussion for 10 meetings, I prepared some little slips and passed them around and asked this question.

I said, "You gentlemen who would not favor this Hatch bill in any shape it might happen to get in, let me know about it by voting 'No,'" because if a majority of the committee would not favor the bill, regardless of what shape it got into, there was not any use taking up any further time of the committee. That looked like horse sense to me. The result of that inquiry was that 12 Members said they did not favor this Hatch bill no matter what shape it got into, and 10 advised me the other way. That was a pretty important determination. I thought the committee ought to give it more mature consideration. I did not want to act on that advice.

There were two gentlemen of the committee who were here in the city, but who were not present at that meeting, and there was one member absent from the city. The next day I spoke personally to one member of the committee who was not present and asked him to speak to the other member and to see that everybody was present the next morning, when I would sound out the committee again. No member of the committee objected or indicated that it did not seem a practical procedure.

The first one of these tests the next morning was in favor of going on with the bill. Then one member said there was a mistake in it; that he was mistaken in his vote. It was tacitly agreed that there should be another vote. It was not really a vote. It was just a convenient method by which I was advised as to the attitude of the committee. Nobody questioned the procedure or made any adverse indications of any sort. Next time when everybody got ready to vote, the ballots having already been distributed, one member of the committee said, "Oh, what's the use of playing with it, I move to table the whole thing."

And so by common consent these ballots instead of being used to advise me, as had been intended, were used to vote on the motion to table. There was not a single member of the committee and, they were all present except one, who protested against that method of voting on the motion to table the bill. Those are absolutely the facts which were unanimously agreed to by each member of the committee this morning, both those who were for and those who were against tabling the bill.

Any newspaperman, as anybody else, can check up on this statement, and he will find it true. We were ready to express our views about it, and we did it in that way. It was thoroughly understood and expressed that any member could go out and tell the world what he did. That vote was 14 to table the bill and 10 against it. That is what happened, and that is all there is to this hullabaloo about a secret vote. That is how the newspapers got a chance to have the people read their abuse instead of examine this bill.

If I followed my natural inclination I would take a little hide off this bunch of people who think they can back-seat drive this Congress by making a horrible example of the Committee on the Judiciary and particularly its chairman. I have respect for the newspapers and for the newspaper's place, but I do not propose to "yes" a bunch of newspapers or anybody else. You know what the notion of a lot of fellows of a "yes" man is.

In addition to what I have said, it is a fact that I never said a word to a single member of our committee, and every member of this committee knows it and will so state, to try to influence him in the slightest degree with regard to what he should do with reference to that bill—not one single human being did I speak to from the beginning of that investigation to this time—not because I favored the bill. I assume every member of the committee and most of the House knew from the beginning that I could not favor it, but I was much inclined to the notion that it might be a good thing if the bill should get to the floor of the House. There is something in the philosophy that things sometimes have to get worse before they get better. In such a situation it is better for them to get worse quickly.

I know that something has got to happen to get us on the job as a self-governing people. I have examined the matter by every test which experience has taught me to use in arriving at a sound opinion. It is my judgment that this Republic is being destroyed by relieving the people of governmental responsibility—the same sort of concentration of governmental power, the same sort of processes as that provided for in this Hatch bill.

As we are destroying the necessity of the people to govern by the concentration of power here in Washington, that ought to be left in the States, we destroy as a result the capacity of the people to govern. I regret especially to oppose my friend the gentleman from New Mexico, JACK DEMPSEY, but I do not believe that we can preserve free government unless we have a responsible people, and we cannot have a responsible people unless we keep them in responsibility. I have tried to figure it the way God Almighty handles the people, and that is the way I think he does it. I am sure of it. We see His plan revealed on every hand, and we see what happens where people ignore His plan.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No, I cannot yield. I do not mean to be discourteous to my friend. If I act with seeming discourtesy during this discussion, I do not mean it at all. I am speaking extemporaneously, and of necessity under great concentration, with my mind thinking, selecting, disconnectedly, and doing all the things it must do, it seems to forget its manners and is constantly embarrassing me. I shall not do as well as some of you might, but let me stumble along as best I can.

Let us make some examination of this Hatch bill to see what it proposes to do. There has been talk about the roll of honor. A roll of honor. Is there any reason on earth why a man should stand on the floor of this House and declare to the world, as he does by supporting this bill, that he represents a constituency not fit for self-government and claim thereby that he is getting on the roll of honor?

And yet they talk about a roll of honor. That declaration is in this bill. What do they propose to do? Let me read you something from this bill:

> No officer or employee of any State or local agency who exercises any function in connection with any activity which is financed, in whole or in part, by loans or grants made by the United States or by any Federal agency shall use his official authority or influence for the purpose of interfering with an election or affecting the result thereof. No such officer or employee shall take any active part in political management or in political campaigns.
> All such persons shall retain the right to vote as they may choose and to express their opinions on all political subjects and candidates.

Such impudence!

These are State people in a State—in my State—where we have heretofore believed we are not yet so base and unfit that we have to go into governmental receivership, turn our matters over to a Federal bureau and turn our citizens over to the governmental power of somebody from Washington. We do not favor graft or corruption, but we are not ready to go out of business as a State government.

Whose place is it to tell the people of my State what they shall do? My State, the great State of Texas! Do you mean to tell me that my people have not got sense enough and courage enough and patriotism enough to tell their people what to do; that we have to come up here and get one of these appointees to tell the free people of the State of Texas what they shall do? And then talk to me about a roll of honor that in order for me to get on it I must slander my people or the great State of Texas by supporting a bill which can have no justification except on the theory that my people who sent me here are unfit to govern as to their own local matters. If I represented a people like that I would quit them in shame! Talk about the Federal power following the Federal dollar. Here we have it with a vengeance. Where did that money come from? It came from the people of the States. It does not matter how little of it gets back to the States. With it, when it gets back, is to be this Federal official proposing to take things over. As soon as some people get to Washington they begin to cultivate the notion that all wisdom, virtue, and patriotism will die with them.

These are exempt from what I have read: The Governor or the Lieutenant Governor of any State or any person who is authorized by law to act as Governor or the mayor of any city; duly elected heads of executive departments of any State or municipality, who are not classified under the State or municipal merit or civil-service system; officers holding elective offices. They are the ones who are exempt—and they are the people who are most likely to offend. Why these exemptions?

Some common man working for his living, boot him out. Who boots him? They send a commissioner down there—one of these birds from Washington. He comes down into your State, and he noses around, and he finds—not the Governor; you bet your life, not the Governor; not the mayor; no, sir, not the mayor, not the people from whom the danger could come; not a mother's son of them are brought under this great bill; but some poor devil who has not got the influence to resist and has not got the money to fight—one of these fellows comes down and he says, "You are engaged in pernicious activity."

One of these people in Washington saying that to my people. Go down there and tell an American citizen of my State such a thing. Then what happens? What chance has he got? What is going to happen to him? Can he get a trial first? No, sir; not on your life; not on your life under this bill. When this appointed governmental "God Almighty" up here in Washington says he does not think the man is doing right, he goes off the pay roll right then. Think of that, and talk to me about an honor roll.

You have slandered your people, saying that they cannot govern themselves and preserve the purity of elections in their respective districts. Oh, I do not mean that. I am sort of mad. [Laughter and applause.] They have sort of been tromping on me.

All right. Poor devil, little fellow who has been booted out, he sneaks across from Texas to Oklahoma. What happens? One of these hounds strikes his trail and runs him into Oklahoma. What happens then? If Oklahoma does not fire him, they fine the sovereign State of Oklahoma 2 years of his salary because one of these impudent Federal employees says so—he is not afraid—no wonder he is not afraid, with a bunch of boot-licking, spineless people in the State, coming up here to the Federal Government and asking them to preserve decency in the elections in their communities. Talk to me about American citizenry. Strut about American citizenship. Talk to me about decency in American citizens, believing in American Government. Why do you not turn it over to a Hitler and be done with it? That is where you are heading for. [Applause.] And talk about the absurdity of this bill. For pure impudence listen to this on page 3, lines 16 and 17, "All such persons shall retain the right to vote."

That certainly is big-hearted. Now, if you want pure unadulterated gall, listen to this:

> Whenever the United States Civil Service Commission determines that, by reason of special or unusual circumstances which exist in any municipality or other political subdivision in the immediate vicinity of the National Capital in the States of Maryland and Virginia or in municipalities the majority of whose voters are employed by the Government of the United States, it is in the domestic interest of persons to whom the provisions of this act are applicable, and who reside in such municipality or political subdivision, to permit such persons to take an active part in political management or in political campaigns involving such municipality or subdivision, the Commission is authorized to promulgate regulations permitting such persons to take an active part in such political management and political campaigns to the extent the Commission deems to be in the domestic interest of such persons.

Who is going to make the exemption? The Commission from Washington, of course. Either we preserve in our Government people capable of self-government or we have got to have one of these governors, and that is all there is to it. Do not fool yourselves, either. How are you going to keep from having them? Keep people on the job of governing.

If you can find in God Almighty's economy any way to preserve decency in our community, responsibility and governmental efficiency, the ability to maintain free government, other than by having the responsibility of self-government inescapably rest upon the people, then I will quit my opposition and vote for this bill. God Almighty in all His wisdom, according to His plan, has no other way for the development of human beings and the preservation of ability, governmental and every other sort, except by putting responsibility upon human beings, making them face their responsibility and pay the price of their mistakes and reap the reward for their nonmistakes. There is no other plan in nature but that, and this Hatch bill turns its back on that plan, denies governmental capacity of the American people in the States; challenges the wisdom of God Almighty's great plan for the development of human beings and cries out for a Federal employee to come down there and kick my people off the pay roll.

What do we mean? What do we mean in this hour when free government, the ability of the people to govern, is challenged in all the world, to declare under the dome of this Capitol we do not believe in it? Keep the plan of this Hatch bill working, practicing the doctrine of defeatism, taking over more and more of the duties of Government, softening and weakening the people, making them irresponsible by relieving them of responsibility, and we will join the rest of the nations who will have to have a dictator. Do not anybody make any mistake about that. You cannot tell me that a man who believes in free government, in self-government, and in the governmental capacity of his people, ought to suggest this sort of bill, even though there is some crookedness going on, things that are wrong.

These difficulties in the communities of the country, these corruptions in public office that need to be cleaned out, are arrangements of Nature that shall and they do challenge men and women to the discharge of their duty. Nobody has ever been improved by things that are all right. It is the weeds that make good farmers. It is tough opposition that makes good football players. It is the law of life. When Uncle Sam goes in the county sits down; nobody has ever made any progress sitting down. It is the people who make this Government, and it is the people who must preserve it. It is the things that are difficult, the things that have to be done, the things that challenge men and cause them to struggle and make a fight and win a victory, that makes them fit to go on and on and on. It is the plan of God, and no man under the dome of this Capitol can overrule the plan of the great God of the universe. Yet we have got some people who do not have any more sense than to think they can do it. [Laughter.]

We are going somewhere from where we are. I have been down the road as far as I can go. I have been back-tracking as far as I can go, and I do not find, in all the history of the ages, a single exception to the rule that when people will not do their duty, when they permit their muscles to become flabby, when they are unwilling to pay the price of liberty; I have never found, in all the annals of human history, a single exception to the rule that that people must be sent to the school of experience and learn, by the lash of oppression, to be obedient to the will of the great God of the universe.

Find me one single exception in all the annals of time that when human beings shift their duty to some super government, are themselves unwilling to pay the price of liberty, that that people were able to remain free. Find one single exception. You cannot do it. Yet we are moving directly in defiance of that solemn warning.

This doctrine of defeatism that we are preaching in America is a doctrine of death. It may be very alluring, this having Uncle Sam come in and do for the people of the States that which is within their governmental capacity, but it is the lure of death to free government. Who is there can believe that we have not got to go back home and clean our own back yards?

The greatest fable to be found in all the fables is that of the family of larks. You all know it. It is worth repeating, for it is the philosophy of life. The old mother lark noticed her young were not quite able to fly but that the wheat was getting ripe. She said to the little larks, "Listen and tell me when I come home tonight what you heard." When the old lark came home that night the little ones said, "The farmer and his sons came out and looked at the grain. They said, 'This grain is getting ripe. We are going to invite our neighbors in to help us harvest it.'"

The old lark said, "You do not have to go yet."

The next report was that the farmer and his sons had come out and said, "Our neighbors failed us. The grain is getting ripe. We are going to ask the kinfolks in."

The old lark said: "You don't have to go yet."

The next report was that the farmer and his sons had said: "Our neighbors failed us, our kinspeople failed us. Tomorrow we are going to harvest it."

The old lark said: "It is time to move."

You bet your life! Oh, may God give us a people in America conscious that they are the Government, a people willing to pay the price of liberty, who will be ashamed to come to the Federal Government and confess their inability to run the local crooks out of their community. God give us men and women under the dome of the Capitol who will be ashamed to confess to the world that they represent constituencies that cannot do the jobs of local cleaning up. If we can be a people conscious of responsibility, strengthened and made responsible by its discharge, I will know that the future of my country is safe. Under the dome of this Capitol, and sometimes in the name of progress, scheme after scheme is evolved to take responsibility, lying close to the people, and shift it up here to Washington. I do not mean to be offensive, but it is a judgment tested by every test by which a human being can test judgment that it is beneath the dome of this Capitol that we are destroying this Republic.

There is not a person in this audience today who can look his little children in the eyes and be sure they can live under a free government. Why? Why? Is it because of fear of foreign invasion? No. There has not been the foot of a foreign foe on this soil in a hundred years. Is it because we do not have the material for food and shelter and raiment? No. Is it because we do not have everything to make us a happy, prosperous, and contented people? No.

What is the matter? The matter is that in America—shame upon this generation—we have turned our backs upon the course of history. We are unwilling to pay the price of being free. Our muscles are soft.

When some trouble comes to my State and to your State in the goodness of God to challenge us to effort, to give us a chance to be a stronger people, a wiser people, a more patriotic people, so that we can have a chance to do the bigger job of tomorrow, what do we do? What do we do? My God! What does this generation do? This generation that hopes that their children may live under a free government—what do their parents do? We turn our back upon the challenge and come hotfooting it up here to get some fellow to come do the job for us. Keep that thing up a little while longer and they will be down there, too, and they will be telling you what to do; and you will do it for two reasons: One, they will have the power; and the other, you will not have sense enough to do it yourself.

God Almighty does not let the ability to do a thing remain where the people who have it do not use it. Do not forget that. I would like to repeat it. It is said there is a law of nature that Nature will not waste its energies. Nature never on this earth permitted ability to do a thing to remain where it is not used. The only way we are going to retain the ability of self-government is by using it, and you cannot use it when you pass bills like this Hatch bill to get somebody else to come in and do your stuff.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I used?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. THOMASON). The gentleman has consumed 25 minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I want to show you a little more about this thing; I will show you the evolution of this bill. I am not going to read it all. This Hatch bill had not got over to the House until they decided to tighten it up a little bit. Whom were they aiming at? They were aiming not at a Governor or a mayor but at that fellow they bumped off of the pay roll, and he went over into Oklahoma and they followed him up under the Hatch bill. That man was fighting for his life, fighting for his right to live, fighting for his right to earn a living.

Think of it. He has not had any trial but he had been put off the pay roll. He has to go off when "infinite wisdom" from up here comes down to Texas. He is not fired; oh, no; but he just does not get any money. [Laughter.] It is a pretty serious thing to deny a man the right to make a living just because somebody goes down there who does not think he is acting right—possibly because he is not voting right. I am not reflecting on anybody. I am talking about power. You put this power into a Federal bureaucracy, Mr. Chairman, and when that Federal bureaucracy has reached its full growth—and we are growing pretty fast—what may happen? Who is to do the enforcing? Is it one of our own local people? No. If there is any prosecution, it has to be by somebody who is a part of that bureaucracy. Did you ever think about that? I will come to it in a minute, and I will talk about it, too.

This bureaucracy business grows mighty fast. It has been growing even since this bill has been under consideration. Under the Senate bill, if anybody was not satisfied with the determination of the Commission he had a right to go to the district court, and when he got to the district court he would have the right to the same sort of trial anybody else had. Was there anything wrong about that?

Think of anybody offering a bill in the American Congress giving to a federally appointed employee the right to bump one of your citizens off the pay roll, follow him into another State, then when he finally gets to court, what shape does he find himself in? If you look at the latest suggested amendment to the Hatch bill which was getting tighter all of the time, you will find this provision—

The review by the courts shall be limited to questions of law—and the findings of fact by the Commissioner if supported by substantial evidence shall be conclusive.

What do you thing about that? Talk about honor? Would you deprive an American citizen of a job under these ruthless circumstances and then strut around here and talk about honor? I guess if these papers had let me alone I would not be saying all these things, at least not so much. Let us see where we are headed for and let us see about this outfit we are turning them over to.

In the various States the people elect their own prosecuting attorneys and, you know, it is a mighty fine thing for the people in the States to feel they are responsible for enforcement of their criminal and quasi-criminal laws. I used to be a prosecuting attorney myself. I do not think there is a more ennobling thing for a community than to have that community respond to a challenge of conditions that ought to be corrected. I have seen it happen. I have seen a challenge like that, and men who never knew they had capacity for leadership stand out in that community and become its leaders.

I have seen them when they made a struggle to clean up their conditions. I have seen the community solidarity that has been developed. I have seen the inspiration that has come. I have seen the consciousness of responsibility and, Mr. Speaker, that is a big thing. In your entire life you never have measured up to your highest possibilities except under the challenge of responsibility. They want to take that away by this bill. They want to take that away from the States in this bill and you tell me that is in line with good American statesmanship?

I have seen the thrill of victory that has come to these communities as they have done their job. The philosophy of this bill is against that sort of thing. The philosophy of this bill says, "You poor little communities, you cannot do anything unless Uncle Sam comes down and tells you what to do." That is the truth.

What do you think about that? Talk about honor? You have not got any honor when you agree to that sort of stuff, and then talk about signing the honor roll. Would you dishonor? I guess if these papers had let me alone I would not be saying all these things, at least not so much. Let us see where we are headed for and let us see about this outfit we are turning them over to.

You know, there is one thing these newspapers have done for me in this situation. They have at least made it possible for me to have a chance to have considered these fundamental things we are discussing. Certainly it cannot be charged now that there is any New Deal or anti New Deal involved.

Nobody is going to charge this bunch of anti New Deal newspapers with being favorably disposed to the New Deal. In other words, I have a chance now to discuss this thing without regard to administration or antiadministration, and I am very much obliged to them for that. I am trying to be useful in my day and generation. I regret that I have been compelled to turn aside in any degree from my normal course in this attempt to preserve my possibility of usefulness against the efforts of these papers to destroy it.

I tell you men and women that the time is at hand when we have to consider these great fundamental principles which concern free government, or else free government must disappear from the face of the earth. This is its last remaining citadel not at this moment under threat of destruction. It cannot remain here except a people capable of self-government shall preserve it, and shall defend it. Do not make a mistake about that. When you think of the responsibility of our Nation today, when you think of the doctrine of defeatism of popular government that has established practically every despot that has ever lived on earth, when you think of the great philosophy of the American system of government, which is that its people are capable of self-government and that they must be held in governmental responsibility, then think what we are doing.

It is tragic. With a rapidity unequaled in the history of government, we are converting this democracy into a bureaucracy and everybody knows it. I am not criticizing the persons who are operating these bureaus. Many of them are my personal friends. They are high-class, efficient, honorable persons. I am talking about the nature of bureaucratic government. What is its nature? Is anybody so ignorant of history; is anybody so ignorant of human nature not to know? Does anybody believe that with a bureaucratic government established it will consent to its own dissolution? Has anyone that little sense? The dominating personalities of such a government usually cluster around some more dominant personality or some figurehead whom they dominate. Their first and continuing concern is an aggregate self-preservation. Power feeds on power.

By this sort of legislation we are putting great power in these bureaucratic agents, and there is no reflection on the men who are doing the work in these bureaus. I want that definitely understood. I am not talking about them. It is their government, and they are as patriotic as I am. I am talking about what is happening to the structure of a great government.

Mr. Speaker, let us be sensible about this thing. This is not a small matter. We are at the crossroads, do not make any mistake about that, and we are going to either turn in the direction that leads us toward preservation of the greatest system of government that ever came through the ages, a heritage to our people, or we are going to keep on the road we are traveling.

My God, what a responsibility rests upon you and myself in this the most tragic hour in the world's history, when free governments are disappearing from the earth, when the hope of the ages is centered in my country, and to a large extent centered in those men and women who now sit underneath the dome of this Capitol. What shall we do? Which way shall we go? Shall we go this way or that way? I do not see how anybody with any sense can fail to know that this fallacy of ours leads eventually toward a Hitler, a Stalin, or a Mussolini. That is the direction in which it is leading. It is leading away from leaving responsibility of government close to the people. There is no one that can challenge that. This is a government of the people. There is no king and there is no hereditary nobility in America. It all depends on the people.

Do you think I could come to Washington and subscribe to the notion that even now my people, who have a great ancestry, my people whose ancestors have preserved a system of government from the first century, my people who left to us the greatest governmental heritage ever left to any people since the ages began, have so degenerated that we have to have somebody from Washington go down there and keep them from being crooked in a local election or in any other election? What do you think of that? I would not do it for my right arm.

We are going somewhere. We are either going back toward the people with these governmental responsibilities or we are going toward a great Federal bureaucracy that eventually will have all the power that Hitler or Stalin ever had. It is inevitable, because when you bring these powers up here—I repeat, I have nothing to say against the people who constitute this personnel, but I am talking about a representative system of government—when you put the power of general government in the Federal organization and destroy the State, the local, responsible, sovereign agencies of government, and put them in the hands of a governmental organization, only one of which is elected by the people, and a million people constitute that organization—why not be sensible?

There is no one who has so little sense that he does not know that the President does not know who these million people are, where they are, or what they are doing with their powers. When you send one of those fellows down into your State, who is watching him? You cannot fire him. You can fire your local attorney; you can stimulate your local attorney to discharge his duty; but when this man comes into your community and you find out he is prosecuting somebody because he did not vote right, what can you do about it? Do not forget where you are putting this power to prosecute.

Do you think that in a fully developed bureaucracy that one who makes up a part of the group will go down and prosecute somebody who is trying to keep him and his group in office? Maybe he would. I would and you would, but that is just two. He probably would prosecute the other fellow when he got around to him, but he would be mighty busy on the ones that did not vote right first. If you have any doubt about it, just check up on history and see how they worked. I am not talking about people; I am not talking about individuals; I am talking about systems of government. Do you think I am going to put that power in the hands of somebody?

Now, you can do what you please about this bill; you are going to do it anyhow. I am proud of my committee. We all get a little warm at times as the weather is warming up a little bit; you know how it is. But I am pretty proud of my committee. I do not think history will pay any attention to me and I do not care. I see a friend of mine here now. When we first came to Congress we were up here in this park, I believe they call it Lafayette Park, where you pass by that horse standing up on its hind legs, that Jackson is riding.

He said, "Hatton, would not you like to know that when you quit here they will do something like this to you?" I said, "No; I would not give a nickel, not a penny." He said, "Well, why?" I said, "In the first place, if this life is all there is to it, I would not know anything about it. If I would go to heaven I could not see it with a spy glass, and if I went to hell I could not enjoy it while being pitched around with a hot pitchfork. Besides," I said, "I do not want to be condemned to eternal horseback riding, anyway." [Laughter.]

I like people; I love people; but I do not think so much of them, especially my own generation. We can go places faster and know less what to do after we get there than any generation that ever lived. I used to think there were some awfully smart people—I mean supermen. I even thought it when I came up here, though I had been weakening on it a bit. I got to batting around here among them, as we country boys used to say, and found out that I was about as smart as many of them, and then I lost nearly all my respect for human intelligence. [Laughter.]

Only God is great in this great economy. The only chance of a really big partnership that you and myself have as statesmen is to find out the plan of God Almighty, the natural laws that govern governments, and try to work in harmony with those laws. Governments are not accidents.

Governments are provided for in the big economy and like all things thus provided for they themselves are governed by natural laws which limit human discretion and determine sound governmental policy. When we examine nature, I do not believe anybody will be confused as to its central objective, and that central objective is the development of people. When you come to examine how people are developed you have no difficulty in discovering that they are developed as they struggle with difficulty. This is the plan of God. As I have had occasion to say before, and I am certain you will agree, difficulties are the gymnastic paraphernalia provided in nature for the development of people. Where we are making a fundamental and a terrible mistake in America is that when we come face to face with some difficulty in government we immediately feel we must turn in the other direction.

When our people in our communities confront a difficulty in government, instead of grappling with that difficulty, they turn in the other direction. We encourage them. That is the tragic thing. These difficulties are provided for in nature. God Almighty has no disposition to avoid difficulties for people. He provides difficulties for people. The difficulties in government constitute a part of the great gymnastic paraphernalia provided for the development of people. But we who have the responsibilities of statesmen are doing our best to deprive our people of the chance to get that development.

Men love liberty, not that they may enjoy the thrill of being free. Men love liberty in order that they may first struggle to be free and gain strength by the struggle, and then that they may do the work of the day incident to being free. We have been foolish enough in America to believe that we can preserve the blessings of liberty without doing the job which Nature has demanded we shall perform if we are to be free. Think about it, men! We are at the crossroads. Our problems run deep. Human wisdom is not wise enough to guide a great republic in an hour like this.

It is not an unmanly thing for men to seek to know the plan of God Almighty for guidance in an hour like this. With all the nations of the earth and with all the blood and the tragedy of the earth, here we are making shipwreck of a great republic—making shipwreck of a great republic, because we are not holding our people to the discharge of the governmental responsibility which lies within the capacity of the small units of government. That is my firm conviction.

We have a great system of government given to us by the ages, which we are destroying. We have the machinery but we will not use it. We are destroying it.

Our States, not too big, functioning largely through small communities, are the places where the voice of the individual citizen may be heard; not here where it is drowned in the tumult of the multitude. His community is not too big for him to have a chance for his influence to be felt; but not here.

How can you expect the people to be able in the future to do the bigger job of America when you withdraw from them the necessity of doing the job of today? Answer me. I want to repeat that. How can you expect statesmen or the American people to do a bigger job for America, which they must do if we survive, if you withdraw from them the necessity of doing the job of today? That is a tragedy. That is why I cannot support this Hatch bill.

That is why I could not support it, if every one of the papers on the face of the earth denounced me three times a day for not doing it. They cannot do anything to me. I go out here on a clear night and I look up at the stars and I realize that I am on a little clod of dirt, and I see these little things around here, like myself, little microbes on this little clod of dirt, get a little job, maybe running one of these little papers [laughter], maybe holding a job like this, or they have a few dollars and then stick their little noses in the air and go strutting their little stuff for a period measured by the sweep of the ages, no longer than a flash of light. The idea of these little things presuming to tell me what to do. I am glad I cannot say what I want to say. [Laughter.]

If there is any chance for a human being to keep a decent fellow with him when he is by himself—then he is all right, but that fellow wanders off from me a lot, but I feel sort of lonesome when he is gone. When I have a pretty decent fellow with me when I am by myself, do you think any of these little microbes can affect me by sticking out their little tongues or clapping their little hands at me? It is just sort of funny. It makes me sort of mad, but it is funny. [Laughter.]

I tremendously appreciate this audience and, Jack, I love you just the same. He is an awfully good fellow, the gentleman from New Mexico, JACK DEMPSEY. I have not said anything about him. I have said a few things at him. I would not let anybody else do it, either. I appreciate very much talking to you today. I am as grateful as one can be to a bunch that one is mad at, to these newspapers who at last have created a condition that makes it possible for me to discuss these fundamental things that I am pretty anxious about without anybody being able to say that I am saying anything against the New Deal or for the New Deal. I had better quit. [Laughter and applause, the Members rising.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include a short resolution introduced by myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks made before the House today and to add thereto some statistics.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks on the Hatch bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include a letter I received on the Hatch bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include an editorial from the Shreveport Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEONARD W. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a letter from the President of the United States, and also a letter addressed to myself.

There was no objection.

Mr. HARTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a short article.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include a radio address delivered by myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BALANCING THE BUDGET

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point, and to include certain tables.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HOW CAN THE BUDGET BE BALANCED UNDER PRESENT CONDITIONS?

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert into the RECORD two tables compiled by myself, which I shall explain. Table I shows that during the first 6 years of this administration, the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia paid into the National Treasury in internal revenue $24,985,417,728. Of this amount $1,705,000,000 was social-security money set aside for an old-age reserve fund, and for which I O U's were issued, leaving net internal-revenue receipts from the States of $23,280,417,728.

It shows that the individual States, Territories, and so forth, drew out of the Federal Treasury in some form of Federal aid during that same period of time, $17,318,263,721. It further shows that during that 6-year period, we paid $5,339,599,913 in interest on the national debt. In other words, when we take the internal revenue which the States, Territories, and the District of Columbia paid into the Federal Treasury, deduct the amount set aside for the old-age reserve fund of the Social Security Act, also deduct the amount paid back to the States in Federal aid, and also the amounts paid in interest on our public debt during those 6 years, we find that we have left of those internal-revenue receipts less than $625,000,000 with which to pay the other expenses of Government during that 6-year period.

It is interesting to note that the State of New York, during this 6-year period, paid into the National Treasury $300,000,000 more than all of the net internal revenue collected by the Federal Government from all the States and Territories in 1939.

I was amazed to learn that the total amount of money paid back to the States in 1939 in Federal aid, plus the interest on the national debt for that year, exceeded the net revenue of the Government by $200,000,000. When we got through paying back the amount of money to the various States, we had to borrow $200,000,000 so we could pay the interest on the national debt. In addition to this sum, we had to borrow money to pay for our national defense program and all other operating expenses of the Government. There was paid back to the States in 1939 in Federal aid $4,420,834,181. The interest on the public debt in 1939 was $940,539,763. The amount paid to the States, plus the interest on the public debt, was $5,361,000,000, or $200,000,000 more than the net receipts of the Government, including customs—and not including the Social Security trust fund—in 1939, which totaled $5,164,800,000, according to the Treasury report.

Six States—Arizona, Idaho, New Mexico, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Wyoming—have a population of 2,921,174, according to the 1930 census figures. Their combined assessed valuation was $2,769,000,000. They paid into the Treasury $71,600,000 and drew out of the Treasury $849,000,000. In other words, they drew out during these 6 years nearly 12 times the amount they paid in. They drew out $283 for every man, woman, and child, or $1,132 for each family of four in those States. They drew out a sum equaling more than 30 percent of the assessed valuation of every piece of property, real and personal, in those six States.

Seventeen States and Puerto Rico paid into the Treasury during that 6-year period $733,310,613, and drew out of the Treasury $3,507,887,320, or approximately five times what they paid in. On the other hand, eight States—California, Illinois, Michigan, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, and Virginia—paid into the Treasury $15,193,329,000 and got back $6,650,694,000.

It is interesting to note that North Dakota got back 23 times what she paid in, or an amount equal to 43 percent of her assessed valuation, while Delaware paid into the Treasury during the 6-year period a sum that exceeds her assessed valuation. South Dakota got back 22 times what she paid in, or 22 percent of her assessed valuation. New Mexico got back 12 times what she paid in, or 40 percent of her assessed valuation. Idaho got back 10 times what she paid in, or approximately 30 percent of her assessed valuation. Puerto Rico got back 14 times what she paid in; Mississippi, 10 times; Arkansas, 9 times; Arizona, Montana, and Wyoming, 6 times; Alabama and Alaska, 4 times.

The record shows that during that 6-year period we paid back to the States and Territories approximately 75 percent of the money we collected from them. When we paid the interest on the public debt out of the remaining 25 percent, very little was left with which to pay other expenses of Government. It is obvious that no plan of balancing the Budget can be successful so long as we have a condition of this kind existing. You cannot eat your cake and have it. You cannot pay this money back to the States and at the same time use it to pay governmental expenses and balance the Budget. Any plan of balancing the Budget must be based upon a principle that the Federal Government must retain a greater share of the revenue it collected from the States, and that Federal aid to the States must be drastically cut. When I say "drastically cut," I am not advocating the cutting of relief funds beyond such cuts as can be made to eliminate waste and extravagance.

The assessed valuation of Michigan in 1936 was $5,630,426,000. Michigan paid into the Federal Treasury during the first 6 years of this administration, from July 1, 1933, to June 30, 1939, $1,275,840,264, or a sum that equals nearly 23 percent of that valuation. It has been estimated that the taxpayers of Michigan have paid, in addition to that sum, during those same 6 years, somewhere around one and a half billion dollars in State and local taxes, fees, and so forth. The total cash disbursements of the State, according to the State treasurer's report for 1938, was $241,345,199. This does not include city, county, township, and other local taxes, fees, and so forth. When we add this State and local tax burden to the Federal burden, we find that the people of Michigan—and they are all taxpayers, direct and indirect—have paid into the Public Treasury during those 6 years a sum that equals nearly 50 percent of the assessed valuation of every piece of real and personal property placed upon the assessment roll by the local assessing officers in 1936.

Michigan's population in 1930 was 4,842,345. This means that there has been collected in Michigan in various kinds of taxes—Federal, State, and local—during those 6 years a sum that equals somewhere around $500 for every man, woman, and child in the State, or a sum that equals somewhere around $2,000 for every family of 4 in the State.

Looking into the future, the taxpayer cannot see how that burden will be lightened. He finds that unless drastic changes are made, and drastic economies are invoked, he will probably have to pay a sum that equals another 50 percent of the assessed valuation during the next 6 years.

In addition to all this, the industrialists and farmers know, and should know, that the national debt has reached $45,000,000,000, and the State and local debt for the Nation is now somewhere around $20,000,000,000, or a total public debt of $65,000,000,000. This sum is almost equal to another 50 percent of the assessed valuation of every piece of property in America as that valuation stood in 1935.

The taxpayer, whether businessman or worker, knows that this tremendous debt is not only a first mortgage on every piece of property in the country equaling 50 percent of its assessed valuation but is a first lien on every dollar that is earned, whether in dividends or by labor. There is no exemption when it comes to paying indirect taxes. Taxes are paid on the bottle of milk the hod-carrier's baby drinks, as well as on the 12-cylinder car the millionaire drives.

I realize, of course, that some of the taxes levied in Michigan are passed on to the consumer in other States, but I realize also that some of the taxes levied in other States are likewise passed on in some form or other to the consuming taxpayer in Michigan.

In view of these facts, is it surprising that the country is alarmed because after nearly 7 years of the New Deal spending program we still have some 10,000,000 people unemployed and millions more on relief? How can industry carry a burden of this kind and still furnish employment to the unemployed? How can the farmer expect to get fair prices for his products when the prices of those products are increased by direct and indirect taxes to where the public, whether employed or unemployed, cannot pay an adequate price or consume an existing surplus? The tax hounds are not only eating all the meat—profit—but they are gnawing at the bone—capital structure.

Mr. Roosevelt, 8 years ago, in 1932, had a philosophy of government which I believe was sound, and which I believe would have carried us out of the depression. Typical of the many expressions is the following, which he made at Pittsburgh on October 19, 1932:

> Taxes are paid in the sweat of every man who labors. If excessive, they are reflected in idle factories, tax-sold farms, and hence in hordes of hungry tramping the streets and seeking jobs in vain.

That statement was true in 1932. Subsequent events have emphasized the soundness of that philosophy. Any sound program of recovery to be successful must be based upon that principle. If that statement was true then, how much more true is it not now in the face of the present picture?

[2] In 1935 or 1936.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under special order the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS] is recognized for 45 minutes.

SHALL OUR CHILDREN LIVE UNDER A FREE GOVERNMENT?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I have asked this time today in order to discuss what seems to me to be the problem that lies closest to the question which was touched on by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] in his very moving address, namely the question as to whether our children will live under a free government or not. It seems to me that question is going to be primarily decided by whether or not we are wise enough and earnest enough to prevent the coming to this country at any future time of what might be called a "revolutionary situation." What does that mean? It means a situation in which the hopelessness of the people about an improvement in their situation causes a break-down in their faith in duly constituted government, and until such situation comes there is little, in my judgment, to fear from any movement which seeks to accomplish the destruction of democracy in America. I think there is more than one group in this country that might today hope to benefit from a revolutionary situation. I think there is one group on the extreme left and another group on the right which does not operate so much in the open, and I think in the long pull the group on the extreme right is far more likely to be the force that does our democracy away. It has been so in every other industrial nation. But all that is necessary to give such groups a chance is long-continued failure on the part of the forces of progress to offer the people substantial hope of security and a betterment of their condition, and all those who would like to see democracy preserved have got to battle against the bitter intolerance of new ideas and the lack of response to measures for a constructive solution of our problems.

I would like to make one brief comment on the speech we have just listened to by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] and to say just this much, that there are those poeple who believe differently about the so-called Hatch bill, for the reason that we would like to do something to prevent the possibility of people from Washington coming out in our States, and preventing people from continuing perhaps to do a very good job in some capacity of Government service, just because those people do not happen to perform the political activities which might be asked of them; and I am not sure that the whole issue is by any means on one side, if we are going to consider the question of what is good government and what will promote responsibility on the part of the people. One thing people certainly should be responsible for is the job they are hired to do in Government service. And some of us do not want anything to interfere with that.

UNEMPLOYMENT

It is my purpose this afternoon to discuss as well as I can in what really is a short space of time the problem of unemployment, and I want it to be understood in the remarks I make that they are not made in any spirit of attack on industry or attack on anything else or anybody else. They are made in a spirit of trying to analyze this problem and see what measures we have to take in order to promote the reemployment of our people. I start with a short quotation from Msgr. John A. Ryan, of Catholic University, one of the truly great leaders of progressive thought in America.

QUOTATION FROM MONSIGNOR RYAN

He says this is a little booklet entitled "Can Unemployment Be Ended?":

Why has unemployment become so widespread and why has it lasted so long? To this audience I repeat the same answer that I have given to some 50 other audiences during the last 10 years. The answer can be stated in two words—"bad distribution." To the question which forms the title of this address, "Can Unemployment Be Ended?" the answer is "yes" if the right methods are adopted and if they are applied over a period of from 5 to 10 years.

Then he goes on to describe what he means by bad distribution, and how it leads to a superabundant setting aside of income by about one-third of the population, with a corresponding inability on the part of the other two-thirds to purchase the things that they really need.

Father Ryan gives this illustration:

Suppose that one-third of the people of New Orleans (which happened to be the place where the address was given) who now receive higher incomes than the other two-thirds, were to save, on an average, one-half of the amount that they now spend for necessities, comforts, and luxuries, what effect would that conversion of spending into hoarding have upon the merchants and businessmen in this city? I need not give you the answer.

THE DISTRIBUTION OF AMERICA'S BUYING POWER

I have here a chart, a most impressive one to me, on income levels in American life. That pyramid represents a division of the American population and shows that at the bottom you have 8,000,000 people who are described on this chart as being very close to hunger all the time. Just above it you have 11,000,000 people who are described as fighting poverty. Above that the comfortable middle class of 8,000,000. Above that the luxury level of 1,585,000 families. And above that people receiving over $5,000 a year, the income savers, the saving level of 800,000 families.

IDLE DOLLARS MEAN IDLE MEN—PROBLEM OF TAX-EXEMPT BONDS

We have heard a good deal about "the devastating effects" of idle capital, of money lying in the banks unused, uninvested, and unspent. We know that our system of economics only works if those savings are promptly put to work. At the present time, and here is one of the solutions I would advance to this problem, at the present time we find ourselves rewarding the people who fail to make investments in constructive enterprise. Why do I say that? Because we offer to those people of substantial means the opportunity to purchase tax-exempt securities; to put their money into savings even if of low yield, investments where they will not be subject to any tax whatever. Furthermore, we tax quite heavily the consumption of the people, the expenditures for the necessities of life, and at the same time we have no provision for the taxation of idle accumulations, nor do we, in my judgment, have the levels of inheritance and income taxation which we ought to have if we really mean business about balancing the Budget and also having a general prosperity.

EFFECT OF HOARDING

I have said many times on the floor before today that industry and agriculture must in each year recover out of the sale of their products at least as much as they disburse in paid-out costs, which in turn are the realized income of all the people of America. And if, as is true, approximately 20 percent of our national income is saved by the top one-third of our people, then we find that industry and agriculture literally cannot recover the cost of the goods that they produce, and you have depression resulting.

The American Federation of Labor submits these figures: That families with incomes of $1,250 and less spend each year more than they receive. They sell property or do something. I do not know how they manage, but at any rate they spend on an average about $92 a year more than they receive. Those are the figures of the National Resources Planning Board as well. The A. F. of L. proceeds with figures in their monthly survey of business for the first quarter of 1940, in which they say that families with incomes of $3,000 and less spend 99 percent of their income, and that families with incomes of $20,000 and above save 51 percent.

HOW ABOUT "CONFIDENCE"

Now, what is the answer to this problem of idle dollars, this problem of bad distribution of income, which is the cause of idle dollars? Is it just to restore confidence? I want to know, in the first place, what we mean by "confidence." Do we just mean that people are going to be willing to put unlimited amounts of money on the stock market, as they did in the late 1920's? That is not going to help us out. It will lead to a new collapse. Do we mean that a war starts some place, as it did last September, and because of the anticipation of war orders you have an increase of production in some few industries in America? Or do we mean by "confidence" that because of the fact that we have seen to it that there will be an even and just flow of consumer purchasing power in the American people's hands, therefore the producers of America have confidence that there will be orders for goods available when those goods are produced?

So I say I think every attempt should be made for the encouragement of business, but I do not think it can possibly be encouragement to business to take any step which cuts consumer buying power in any direction whatsoever—such as by cutting the W. P. A. employment at a time like this.

HOW ABOUT THE 1920'S? AND DEBT?

The 1920's have been discussed a good many times and pointed to as a period of great prosperity. It has been said that we ought to get back to that period so that we would not be increasing the public debt like we are now. I have some interesting figures here that in the decade of the 1920's the debts of local governments, States, and counties, increased a total of $10,000,000,000; that we made foreign loans so that foreign countries might buy goods from America, of about five billion dollars, which were never repaid, and that consumer debt expanded $10,000,000,000.

You have $25,000,000,000 of new debt injected as buying power into the purchasing-power stream in those twenties. Those debts, most of them, the consumer debts and the foreign loans at least were never paid. We see this debt problem more plainly now than we have ever seen it before because it is concentrated largely in one place, namely, the Federal Government. We must have an increase in the power to purchase, else we will find that we simply are failing to decently operate what ought to be an expanding dynamic economy, and our failure can be directly traced to the fact that we are trying to operate it on the basis of a debt-money system, where the greater your power to produce becomes the greater your debt must be, because your medium of exchange is literally based on that debt. We need to learn that when our power to produce increases it ought to be true that we will, under those circumstances, increase the volume of our active buying power without an increase in public debt.

REASONS WHY A RETIREMENT PENSION SYSTEM IS AN ECONOMIC NECESSITY

One-third of our people today can produce all of the necessities of life needed by all the people, but unless all the people are able to consume their share of those necessities, even that one-third cannot keep their jobs. We have today a vast excess of unused capacity in industry. Technological improvement increases it every day. I do not know a single businessman—maybe there is one—who would like to see additional capacity in his own industry. Oh, yes; they like to see somebody else expand; they would like to see capital expenditures made in another industry but not in their own, because they feel and know that there is already enough unused capacity in their particular field to more than supply the demand for the goods of that particular field. What those businessmen want is more demand for the goods they have capacity to produce and sell. So I think that means that we have got to consider this question of unemployment primarily from the standpoint of that consumer demand, and we must further realize that the only answer to it is a higher standard of living, that you cannot solve unemployment merely on the basis of producing food, clothing, and shelter for the American people. If you are going to add to employment then, and if you do not want to give purchasing power away to foreign countries so they can just take your goods and never pay for them, or do some other crazy thing in order, deliberately, to create that new demand—indeed, if you want to avoid a constant danger of war you must have considerable new investment in what I might term social capital, such as health service, more hospitals, better homes, more things to make life better, richer, and fuller, not just because we want to pamper anybody, but because it is an economic necessity that we should have that kind of thing, else we will bog down industry after industry with unused capacity.

Let me ask you to think of this: In the years 1935, 1936, and 1937 American industry spent $17,400,000,000 for additional plants. There was that much plant expansion paid for in those years. Of that $17,400,000,000, $16,000,000,000 came from internal sources—I mean it came out of the corporate savings of those industries themselves; I mean they did not have to borrow a dollar of it or get a dollar of it from any other investor at all. It came out of their own depreciation accounts. It had already been paid for by the people who bought the goods. Business and the public, too, cannot put money aside in anything like that volume and still have a market. You cannot eat your cake and have it too, Mr. Speaker; you cannot let great corporations and a few people accumulate in idle pools as much money as they want to and also have the people as a whole able to buy the goods that are produced, perhaps, by those very same people's industries. We expect unlimited investment opportunities without a distribution of buying power, and such a combination simply is not possible. The general pattern of the answer that is to be given to this phase of the problem—of excessive accumulations of idle funds—and I think it is a long-time problem—I mean I do not think it is going to be removed by confidence or anything like that; I think the basic answer to it is, generally speaking, this: We must have a tax program, together with a social-security or a pension program, or whatever you want to call it, which will lift about $4,000,000,000 to $5,000,000,000 annually out of what would otherwise be idle funds desiring to be invested but not finding profitable investment into the active stream of consumer purchasing power. I want to see that done not in some hit-or-miss manner by pushing certain people onto relief who ought to be at work and paying them a dole. I do not want to see some people a part of the economic system and other people not a part of it, but I believe the way that that has got to be taken is by deciding that those people who have served the Nation longest shall be permitted to consume, although they do not produce. Coupled with that, I think there ought to be a tax which would reduce the volume of now-idle funds. If that is done, you will find that the remainder of the accumulations in the hands of the class that can save will find opportunity for prompt investment—first, because the investment-seeking funds will be smaller in total volume; and, second, because there will be a better demand for consumer goods and hence more likelihood of a good market for the increased volume of commodities to be produced as a result of the investment.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Would the gentleman then advocate repeal of the social-security pay-roll tax, and have the funds for the operation of the social-security program collected from some other source, say by a net-income tax?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I would be very much better satisfied if that were done.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. That pay-roll tax decreases the purchasing power of the rank and file of the mass of producers?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Inevitably that happens and furthermore, it is a very difficult act of administration, both from a national standpoint and from the standpoint of the individual businessman. I would like very much to see us have the nerve to fix our individual income-tax rates at a point where they would be proper to finance to system of social security and old-age retirement pensions. I would rather see that done.

NEED FOR EXERCISE BY CONGRESS OF ITS POWER TO CREATE NATION'S MONEY

That is not the whole story. It is not just a question of idle funds. It is more than that. We are afraid of machines. We are afraid machines are going to take jobs away because we as a nation have never realized that they are wealth-creating and, therefore, demand the creation of additional debt-free medium of exchange. The great problem of America is for us to see and understand that the right to create the medium of exchange is a national right and must be lodged in this Congress and must be exercised by it. If I could do that one thing, I would rather do that than anything else in all the world.

If all the income in the hands of those who are able to save were promptly invested in new capital goods, we would have no trouble to maintain employment in that year. If all the savings are invested in a current year, everything will be all right for that year, but the next year you have an additional capacity that you did not have before and you have to have an additional buying power to match it. Always in the past we have tried to get that by expansion of debt, because the only way we create money now is by the creation by the banks of demand deposits so that loans can be made by the banks. You cannot have that go on, because your debt cannot expand forever. So what happens is that periodically you have a collapse and the savings of the country are wiped out, your property values are cut in two and misery spreads among the people.

That happens because the people who control the creation and destruction of our bank-deposit money will see that it happens. As soon as they discover that the purchasing power of money is going down and prices rising, they will find their particular commodity—money—is getting too cheap and, as they did in 1920 and 1929, they will withdraw from circulation several billion dollars of bank credit merely by not renewing loans, which is all they have to do in order to increase the value of money and drive down the value of everything else. And yet we sit here helpless and say the only thing we can do is increase the public debt to meet the problem. That is wrong.

WHEN EFFICIENCY INCREASES

Mr. Speaker, the Brookings Institution gives out the figures that between 1922 and 1929 the output per worker in the United States increased by 18 percent. That means one of three things was going to happen. Either the price of goods was going to decline 18 percent so that the people would be able to buy 18 percent more goods, with the same volume of buying power, or if that did not happen you were going to have to create 18 percent more money as an addition to the consumer purchasing power of the country, that is, 18 percent more money in active circulation in the hands of the consumer so that they might buy 18 percent more goods, or else you would have to fire 18 percent of the workers and cut down that much of your force because you could produce as much as you did before with less people.

Monopoly control of industry prevented a reduction of prices. Monopoly control of finance prevented an increase in the volume of money in circulation. So the third thing happened. May I say, I am not one who believes that the right solution of this lies in a general reduction in prices. I do not think that has ever worked. I think we can look at the history of our country over a long period of time and we will find that never has there been a period of prosperity when the price level was going down, and as John Maynard Keynes, the great English economist, stated, over a long period of time there has been a tendency for the wage unit to rise constantly. In other words, the answer to increased production is increased buying power for the people who must spend because they have need of goods. The question is, Shall creation of money follow automatically upon the creation of wealth or must debt always intervene and cause collapse and depression? Production we find is increasing and has in recent years increased. This additional production of goods results in the creation of real buying power—for real buying power is goods produced—but it must be represented by the tickets which we call money and these tickets if poorly distributed or in insufficient quantity means that some of that real buying power in the form of goods produced cannot be taken off the shelves.

CENTRAL PRINCIPLE

I am going to skip some excellent quotations which I have here, because I will not have time. The main point I want to make this afternoon is this: As the Nation, through the genius of its inventors, the organizing ability of its executives, the skill of its labor grows, as its power to produce increases, there is required additional consumer demand. At present that increase has been accomplished only by an increase in debt, because the Congress has given away its constitutional right and duty to create the money of the Nation. Instead it should be our primary economic law that the growth of productive power of the Nation should be matched year by year by a corresponding percentage increase in the volume of money in circulation. And that money must be created debt-free by the Congress of the United States.

To illustrate my point I submit the following quotation from Institutional Economics, page 589, by Prof. John R. Commons, for many years dean of American economists:

> The fundamental reason why the share theories of the national monetary income do not account for the alternating booms and depressions is because increasing the share of one class reduces the shares of other classes and does not change the total purchasing power of all classes. The purchasing power of all classes, whether expended as savings or expended for consumption, furnishes the same employment for labor, barring temporary difficulties of adjustment. In order to increase the purchasing power of labor the unemployed must be put to work by creation of new money, and not by transferring the existing purchasing power of taxpayers to laborers, as Malthus proposed, nor by borrowing money by government which transfers investments but does not augment them. This new money cannot be created and issued by bankers, either in commercial, investment, or central banks, because, in a period of depression, the margins of profit have disappeared, and there are no business borrowers willing to cooperate with bankers in creating the new money. In order to create the consumer demand, on which business depends for sales, the Government itself must create the new money and go completely over the head of the entire banking system by paying it out directly to the unemployed, either as relief or for construction of public works, as it does in times of war. Besides, this new money must also go to the farmers, the business establishments, and practically all enterprises, as well as to wage earners, for it is all of them together that make up the total of consumer demand.

Here is something I put in a little pamphlet I wrote 2 years ago which I would like to read:

> The Government of the United States has a primary duty to see to it that the consumption of the Nation keeps pace with its production, and one of the primary methods it must use in accomplishing this is the establishment of a scientific relationship between the supply of money in circulation and the productive capacity of the country.

As long as there are idle noninvested funds, and too much investment money, as long as there is idle, unused machinery and manpower, there are only three answers to the problem: First, either compensate for the drawing off of that idle money by Government borrowing and Government spending of a like amount; second, set up a system of taxation for the payment of some kind of benefits, either old-age retirement pensions or by the payment of wages to people for real work done; or, third, provide a scientific, modern, and workable monetary system.

Government debt today is simply a substitute for private debt, made necessary because of the paramount need to try to keep our debt-money exchange medium up to a point where it will demand the additional use of now idle productive capacity.

PROBLEM OF MONOPOLY WITHOUT MONOPOLY MACHINES WOULD NOT CAUSE UNEMPLOYMENT

I said a while ago we are worried about the machine, and we are afraid of the machine, and I have given you one reason why. There is another reason why. I do not believe that machines would create unemployment if it were not for the fact that many of the machines are controlled by monopolistic concerns, but monopoly plus the machine or monopoly plus technological improvement does mean unemployment. Technological change without monopoly would not mean unemployment. Monopoly causes unemployment because it maintains high prices and restricts output. Competition cannot do either of these things even if it wanted to. Monopoly siphons off the benefits of the machine into huge corporate surpluses made possible by excess monopoly profits.

Under conditions of true competition, the benefit of the machine would go to the consumers in lower prices and to the producers engaged in larger production of other goods for which consumers would have purchasing power which they did not have before. Such considerations are among the best arguments for such enterprises as the Tennessee Valley Authority, which have the effect of breaking down monopoly price structures and reducing the cost of electricity to consumers.

So we find that we have a great growth of the productive power of the country brought about by technological improvement over the years, that we have a great disparity in income between various income groups, that we have to have abundant consumption in order to have abundant production, that all efforts must therefore be directed to increasing that active consumer demand, and that only by higher living standards among our own people, by enabling our people to consume what they can produce so easily, can we solve this problem and put our people back to work.

CAUSES OF UNEMPLOYMENT

I would list in the following order the main causes of unemployment:

First, a faulty distribution of income as between the various groups of our people, as between different sections of our country, and between agriculture on the one hand and industry on the other. Second, the large volume, as a consequence of bad distribution, of idle accumulations of would-be investment funds. Third, monopoly, technological change, and the machine, which I have said are bad only when and because controlled by monopoly. Fourth, low farm income. And, finally, the debt-money system, which prevents any other method than an increase in public debt being used to keep the volume of active buying power in line with the Nation's power to produce.

LONG-RANGE BASIC ATTACK ON UNEMPLOYMENT

I have already suggested several things that I think must be done about this problem. I want in just a very few minutes to give you what seems to me to be a valid, long-range program to end unemployment, the sole aim of which is production and consumption of abundance. We cannot do justice to people when by helping one we hurt another. Instead of battling over the division of a "too little" we ought to be working to change that "too little" into "enough for all." Our effort must not be to regulate scarcity but to induce abundance.

FIRST. TAXATION

The things that I will mention here are in five fields. In the first place, in the field of taxation, our major purpose must be to tax money that is not spent or invested—that is, idle accumulations. Our second effort should be to place the burden where it can best be borne. Our third principle should be to levy by direct taxes and not hidden taxes. Specifically, no more tax-exempt bonds, and a provision that even now the income derived from tax-exempt bonds must be reported in making an income-tax return as a part of the income received by that person. This he is not now required to do. For tax purposes the income from tax-exempts is regarded as nonexistent. That one thing will mean that we cease encouraging people to put their money away into the purchase of instruments of debt, and thereby encourage the man who does invest in constructive enterprises.

In the second place, for reasons that will soon be evident, there must be an increase in income, inheritance, and estate taxes, and lower exemptions in these cases; an increase in income taxes in the middle brackets; yes, and some lowering of exemptions. The exemptions from the estate tax, totaling about $120,000 in all, are far larger than they should be. I would graduate corporate income taxes more than they are, but I would exempt the little corporation—for example, the one earning $10,000 or less—completely, and I believe it could be done without too much loss of revenue.

Then, I would pass a bill at the moment, a war excess-profits tax bill, one of which I have introduced. Its number is H. R. 9513. This bill, which I have already explained to the House, is based on the principle that you take a base period and figure normal profits, but never less than 5 percent, and the tax does not apply to those normal profits at all, but it does apply to those corporations which are benefiting greatly today, a few, in a few lines of business, out of the war situation abroad, while many other sections of the American economy are hurt by it. The bill I have introduced would, experts tell me, raise some half billion dollars of revenue.

As I said to the gentleman from Wisconsin a while ago, I would replace the pay-roll taxes that we now have for social-security purposes with the other forms of taxation I have just mentioned. I think they are sounder taxes because, I believe, they would go much further in bringing about this balance between consumer buying power and investment funds, about which I have spoken. As a further measure along this line I would reduce just as much as possible the consumption taxes, except the ones on liquor and tobacco.

SECOND. NATIONAL SYSTEM OF RETIREMENT PENSIONS

The second thing I think we need is a system of retirement pensions for the older people of the country. I think we need it because a part of our people can produce enough for all the people, and therefore, and under those circumstances, you have to have some of the people who are able to consume even though they do not take part in current production. If that is true, this group should not be selected on a hit-or-miss basis, with Tom Jones, over here, with a wife and four children, out on relief or something like that when he ought to be and wants to be at work. This group of people can be selected on the basis of age, as having made their contribution, for then there is no danger of the discouragement and sapping of the spirit that might take place in younger people, but where there can be a reward for service rendered. Such a system of general retirement pensions for people past 60 should be used as our principal means of keeping a balance between our capacity to produce and our power to consume.

I would have it a general system. I would have it the same in every State of the Union, and I would have it apply to every group in the population, with the possible exception of those whose current income is sufficient so that they clearly do not need it. Do not make anybody take it. Do not say you have got to take it; but say if you have no other means of income and if you wish to retire from industry, then you may retire decently and with respect.

THIRD. CURB MONOPOLY

The third thing I would say is basically important is a restoration of competition, and a curbing of monopoly to the greatest possible extent. I think we have been all too short-sighted about the enforcement of the antitrust laws, trying to save a million dollars or something like that by cutting the appropriations for that purpose, when we ought to have seen that the very future of democratic government may well depend upon the break-up of some of these monopoly holdings. We have not explored, so far as I know, the inter-corporate dividend tax where the changing of two little figures in the revenue laws which allow an 85-percent exemption to corporations on dividends received from other corporations might be of telling effect in breaking up control of one corporation by another one. If we reduced that dividend exemption to 50 percent, let us say, we would break up more holding companies than we ever can break up by regulation.

Then I think it is most important that we do what we can to equalize credit opportunities for small business as compared to great business. Perhaps the greatest injustice in the whole financial system is the fact that those who enjoy the privilege of creating credit can create at will bank-deposit credit and buy real property in America with it. They can decide what business is going forward and what business is going back or what industry is going to go forward or what industry is not. The little fellow does not have much chance. So I insist that one of the main things to be considered is the equalization of credit opportunities between large- and small-scale enterprises.

Maybe this is not economically perfect. Maybe you could theoretically get more goods produced under monopolistic conditions. But you cannot get them sold. And I am sure that in preserving a free democracy it is necessary to preserve as the backbone of the Nation the independent farmer and the small-scale merchants and the small manufacturers.

FOURTH. JUST INCOME FOR AGRICULTURE

This brings me to the matter of the protection of the family size farm owner, and I am going to say now that I am about 101 percent in favor of the Jones-Wheeler farm-credit bill, because what it will mean in the net result is 3-percent interest to the farmers, and there is not any reason in the world why they should not have that. When private banking institutions loan money to farmers they simply monetize the farmer's property and loan against his mortgage. But when he borrows through a Government credit agency that agency must not, according to the way we do things now, perform the credit-creating function which a private bank does. It must first sell bonds to raise the credit and pay interest on the bonds, and then lend to the farmer at a rate high enough to cover that interest. I cannot possibly understand why a Government credit agency should not do exactly what the private banks do—namely, monetize the farmer's property and loan directly against his mortgage. Were that done, with no interest on bonds to pay, we could get the interest even below 3 percent. However, this bill does not even propose that. It proposes sale of guaranteed Government bonds to raise the credit and the lending of money to farmers at 3 or 3½ percent, with opportunity, as I understand it, of refinancing present outstanding debts on this new basis. By increasing the security and lowering the debt burden of the farmers, this measure will contribute much to the solution of unemployment.

I think one of the best things that has been done recently is the blue-stamp plan of the Surplus Commodity Corporation. It means enabling people who need food to consume the food the farmers have already produced. It ought to be expanded, though, until it reaches the whole country, and if you wonder how it is going to be paid for, I would just like to suggest that we know one thing for sure. It would improve economic conditions in this country. We know if we could have the pre-depression price level for basic agricultural commodities, things would be better, the farmer's buying power would be increased, and the demand for goods thus created would help reduce city unemployment. And we know that always in the past when we put an additional volume of money into circulation, the prices of these basic commodities rose. Here are goods already produced, here are hungry people ready to consume them. Why can we not use the power of the Government to create credit in order to enable people to consume those goods until such time as the price level for those basic commodities has been restored? The answer is, of course, that we can, if only we would; and the results can be predicted by a glance at history. They would be good results.

FIFTH. MONETARY REFORM

So I say our central task, after all, is a monetary task, for our whole life depends today on money. None of our people produce what they are going to consume themselves. We live by exchanging products and services with one another, and if this exchange does not take place, we are in trouble, and, it is also within our power by increasing the volume of money in circulation to enable our people to consume very nearly all our farm products. That is our main problem—to enable the American people to consume as they produce.

I believe human liberty will either be saved or lost here on the floor of the House of Representatives and on the floor of the Senate. I believe this because America of all the nations of the earth still has an excellent chance of demonstrating that free parliamentary government and a free economic system are capable of providing to the people of a great Nation opportunity to earn a living, security against the mischances of life, and substantial freedom for the spirits of men. If that is done democracy and freedom will live and will overcome all threats and dangers. If it is not done they may suffer temporary eclipse. I have no fear or concern for the ultimate outcome of the struggle between freedom and oppression. Our great grandchildren will gain back inevitably what we may lose for our children and grandchildren. But I am concerned not only for the distant future but the immediate future as well.

The issue is in our hands and we shall not meet it unless we act both wisely, boldly, and with our concern focused on the general welfare of all the Nation. I am convinced that there is now before the House certain legislation which, if enacted, would go so far toward putting our people back to work and stimulating our production that instead of dark forebodings of disaster we would hear from the lips of Americans a new and buoyant hopefulness.

Let no one mistake the temper of the people. They are not looking for a conservative program. All they know is that they are still unemployed, still in distress, still without decent provision for retirement in old age. They may vote for a change in 1940. If they do, it will not be because the Republican Party promises them deflation and the sort of thing about which Republican members speak here in the House. It will be because Republican speakers make the same approach they made in 1938—because they promise more indeed than the Democrats do. If a change comes in 1940 it will be just because the people want a change. But I fear they will get a different kind of change from the one they want. The American people want a solution to this economic problem. And they will go right on kicking people out of office until they get it. So far I fail to find one single suggestion from the Republican ranks that offers hope of that solution. And so far I think my own party has also failed to strike effectively at the root of the difficulty, though one basic fact has been demonstrated by its work; that the task of government in this day is to so increase the consuming power of the people as a whole that it will call forth inevitably an increase in productive activity and sustain it thereafter.

The economic system under which we now operate has never provided work or decent incomes to the people except during periods of rising prices, deflation of outstanding debts, and net additions to buying power from somewhere. To suggest that merely to repeal New Deal laws, balance the Budget, and reduce taxes will put the American people back to work is the very height of folly, deception, and lack of historical perspective.

To suggest that more capital goods production is the answer is like suggesting that without any increase in the market for his corn, a farmer can solve his problem by buying more corn planters or constructing a larger barn. And what happens to inventories if we have a capital-goods expansion and neglect the all-important matter of consumer buying power?

For many years this was done by westward expansion. People who today would go on W. P. A. or some similar program were given land, and, moreover, there was a constant increase in the volume of new borrowing—that is, new-money creation by the banks. This was made possible by the fact that finance could and did constantly monetize or loan against anticipated increases in the value of American property. Property values meanwhile were constantly being increased, especially in new western cities, and so the real burden of debt was correspondingly being reduced.

When the period of expansion was over, there came in the early twentieth century a period which might have been exactly like the period in which we now live but for the World War. The World War meant, of course, that we did get money for the destructive work of war, even though we would have heard howls of impending disaster if we had gotten it to pay to our people for constructive work in their own country. We paid out several billions dollars in one way or another during the war and there was prosperity. We didn't know how to put people to work to increase the American standard of living. But we did know how to take our best workers out of production and send them to war and then to keep the rest of the people at work at high wages trying to make up for the destruction of the war. Consuming power was deliberately and artificially increased relative to production and there was prosperity. All these facts about the war period make me wonder whether we will one day once again condemn our sons to a hero's death because we, their fathers, lacked the courage to establish a system of decent retirement pensions in this country or to lay patriotic hands on the financial monopoly which now claims the exclusive right to monetize the property, growth, and resourcefulness of the American people and teaches this great Nation that it must always incur a staggering increase in debt in order to enjoy a short-lived prosperity.

The analysis of our economic ills which has underlain the policies of the New Deal has been briefly this: The depression was caused by failure of the buying power of the people to keep up with the inventories piled up by an ever-more efficient productive machine. Therefore, by a program of public works, loans and grants to farmers, and a variety of other methods the attempt was made to increase consumer demand which after all is and must always be the one and only mainspring of production.

The New Deal analysis is fundamentally sound. As long as the New Deal followed it we had improvement. Improvement stopped when in 1937 the opposite policy of retrenchment was temporarily adopted.

But there is no essential difference between what the New Deal has tried to do and what has been done before in every prosperous period in American history, except that under the New Deal a sincere attempt has been made to protect the poor, the farmers, and the wage earners of America from want.

The central fact is, however, that only when somehow a net addition to purchasing power over and above that paid out currently by industry was being put in circulation has there been prosperity.

And after the war was over what happened? With the cruel, deliberate destruction of our money supply by the simple and easy process of credit contraction which the Federal Reserve Board carried through in 1920 the prosperity of American agriculture collapsed. It has never come back since. But a new, ingenious idea was evolved to save industry, which had the ear of Government. It was the sale of foreign bonds in the United States. Beside that operation, which, added to unpaid war debts, accounted for an outright gift of some $22,000,000,000 of buying power from American investors to foreign buyers of American goods, our current purchases of gold and silver are comparatively insignificant. The thing held together until 1929, when it began to become apparent that the bonds were no good and the foreign debts would not be paid. Then the bubble burst, not because the debts were not being paid but because the method of increasing buying power had become discredited. The central idea of the New Deal is not new. It uses wages instead of free land; and it pays our own people for work to increase consumers' buying power at home instead of giving credits to foreign countries for them, not to pay back.

And why has it been necessary to artificially increase the buying power of consumers every single time that we have succeeded in achieving anything like a prosperous condition? Here, I think, is the reason. Look at these figures for the year 1929.

National income produced	$81,128,000,000
National income paid out	78,556,000,000
All savings, individual and corporate	20,000,000,000
Gross capital formation	11,489,000,000

Flow of producers' durable commodities plus business construction.

In this year there were $81,000,000,000 of goods and services produced. Somehow they had to be sold or depression would result. But in order for this to happen there would have had to be exactly $81,000,000,000 spent by consumers for these goods and services. Now $78,000,000,000 was paid out by industry in that year, almost enough to match its output of goods and services. But of that $78,000,000,000, $29,000,000,000 was saved and not spent. Eleven billion dollars of it was invested, which means it was turned into new machinery of production the value of which was absolutely dependent on there being a future market for an increased volume of goods. The other $9,000,000,000 remained idle and inactive. And the depression deepened upon the Nation.

It did so for lack of two essential adjustments in the economic system. The first is an adjustment so that as a portion of current consuming power is diverted into new-capital formation—or new-production goods—there will be brought into circulation debt-free by Government a volume of new consuming power sufficient to balance that proportion of investment which does not go to wages of one kind or another but is frozen into the value of the finished new equipment itself. The second adjustment is more complicated and probably never can be perfect. It is to reduce the volume of savings to the point where they will not exceed the amount required for new profitable investment. I have already spoken of this.

Lacking these adjustments the only way under our present monetary system that the Nation can have enough buying power to balance its production and keep inventories from engulfing every business in the country in bankruptcy is if somebody borrows the additional required buying power into circulation. Unless you are going to let the Nation collapse completely Government must do this borrowing unless somebody else does. This explains the New Deal's deficits. It explains its borrowing. It explains them completely.

And it also proves to me, at least, that we have got to change the debt-money system under which we are now trying to operate our national economy. That debt-money system spells death by strangulation for every value that you and I hold dear. It has got to go.

To prove this let us assume that all the savings of 1929 or any other year were promptly invested. Let me read to you one paragraph from Joan Robinson's profound work Introduction to the Theory of Employment.

> The tragedy of investment is that (unless stimulants are applied) it can never remain at a constant level. For if the rate of investment one year is the same as the last, then, generally speaking, the level of employment and incomes and therefore the level of demand for goods will be the same in the second year as in the first. But all the time capital is accumulating and in the second year there is a larger amount of equipment available to meet the same demand for commodities. The rate of profit consequently falls off, future prospects are dimmed by the decline in present receipts, and in the third year new investment appears less attractive to entrepreneurs than in the second.

New investment implies that somehow the community has made a corresponding sacrifice of current consumption. But such new productive wealth is the soundest base for money in the world. And unless that increase in productive capacity is matched by a corresponding net increase in the volume of actively circulating money in the hands of consumers, the investment itself will spell not economic health and growth, but economic death and the destruction of the very values the investment itself is supposed to represent. The only ultimate purpose of investment is to produce goods which somewhere along the line must be sold to a consumer. Without that consumer—indeed, without him plus money in his pocket no investment is sound.

Government in this age must be free to capitalize the economic growth of the Nation—that is, free to create money and pay old-age pensions with it or wages for public works with it in sufficient quantity to keep consuming power equal to productive power in an expanding economy. This is not inflation, it is only common sense. And this is the reform that H. R. 4931 would accomplish and it is why I believe that bill is one of the three or four most essential and urgent matters before this Congress at this time.

I want to quote one or two things that I think will be of interest to you. First I quote from an open letter of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States which he sent to Senator WAGNER, chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate. He says in that letter:

> A factor that more than any other will increase the confidence of businessmen in the future is the assurance that business will improve; a development contributing substantially to that expectation would be the prospect of a stable or moderately rising price level. What businessmen fear with regard to the dollar is not that the price level in the United States may remain stable or rise but that the price level in the United States may fall, i. e., that the purchasing power of the dollar may rise.

So much for my discussion of a program in five fields of our national economic life that would, in my humble judgment, go a very long way toward solving our unemployment problem. I have not gone into the details of what a scientific monetary system should be like, for I have done that heretofore on more than one occasion and shall no doubt do it again many times in the future. I have given the governing principles. Now, before I am through I want to talk about our immediate situation and a measure that I believe fits that situation too perfectly to be overlooked or neglected.

A BILL WHICH COULD AND SHOULD BE PASSED AT ONCE AND WHICH WOULD START OUR ECONOMY ON AN UPWARD CLIMB WITHOUT A DOLLAR'S INCREASE IN PUBLIC DEBT

We have today in the Treasury a vast store of monetary resources which are virtually hoarded there. I have already spoken about this in the House. Without giving the impression that it will give a complete answer to our problem or that it will establish the kind of monetary system I believe is necessary in this day of vast productive capacity, I want to explain, if I have the time, a little bit about a bill that I have prepared. This bill proposes to take a billion and a half dollars of the silver seignorage that now lies idle in the Treasury and a billion and a half dollars of the gold credits that are in our stabilization fund and use those $3,000,000,000 as a base for loans at 1-percent interest of the following three types: First, to revive the Public Works Administration by putting $1,000,000,000 at its disposal for making loans at 1-percent interest to public bodies for public works; second, $1,000,000,000 to the Federal Housing Administration to enable them to loan 45 percent of the cost of a $4,000 house at 1-percent interest to a man who has already borrowed another 45 percent under the regular guaranteed-loan plan of the F. H. A. Under the terms of the bill, F. H. A. is also empowered to loan up to $1,000 to owners of homes for their modernization or repair—these loans also to be at 1-percent interest.

The other $1,000,000,000 to the Department of Agriculture, $500,000,000 of it to be used under the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act, in order to put that additional credit in the Department of Agriculture to enable farm tenants to become farm owners. One hundred million dollars of this money is for loans to people who used to be farm people but who have been driven off their farms and are now migrants to enable them to settle on reclamation projects, because they need about $2,000 per family to enable them to do it. The remaining $400,000,000 is to be loaned to farmers for improvement of the soil, buildings, or equipment of their own farms. All these loans are to be made at 1-percent interest.

What does it mean? It means that instead of basing the credit of this country on a bond that we sell to a bank for the figures the bank writes on its books, and upon which we must pay interest, we use some of the monetary resources now lying idle in the Treasury of the United States. When I was a boy I was told that if you had 5-percent gold reserve behind money it was sound, but today you are not taught that. You are told that you must not touch the gold or the silver, because it would mean inflation. What inflation means is that you create money faster than your productive capacity can keep up with it, and we are not in that situation. We are in a situation where we should be putting enough money into the hands of the people for purchasing power to keep up with the production actually taking place.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Would not the gentleman's proposal put back into the hands of Congress the power the Constitution gives us to coin money and regulate the value thereof?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. For a moment. We would be asserting that we have the right to make use of these monetary resources, but we would not have established a system or done the job with it that I think needs to be done, such as to purchase the 12 Federal Reserve banks and make once and for all the decision that the bank of issue of the United States shall be forever a bank under the control of Congress and belonging exclusively to the whole American people.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. In other words, the gentleman's proposal is a first step and not the only or last step by any means.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. That is right. It would not even be a first step. It would be the kind of measure every one knows we need to expand production. It would be a means of putting out additional money into the hands of the very people who will best use it, but without increasing the public debt one single dime. Those funds would come back again. This bill would revive the Public Works Administration and it would extend our attack on farm tenancy. It would make more vigorous the prosecution of our program for soil conservation, and would stimulate the construction of individual homes for families among our people at a lower rate of interest.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I agree with the gentleman on the wisdom of a wider use of both gold and silver in our monetary system. I will not interrupt further, but I would like to add, when time permits, a plan for the use of silver seigniorage, which is a part of the gentleman's scheme. Silver seigniorage since July 1, 1939, when we remonetized silver, is in a class by itself. I would like to see it used in the very worthy way to stimulate the whole mining industry.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I may say that personally I am not in favor of going back on any gold standard. I merely point out that to base our credit on this metal which we have bought and paid for is far more sensible than is the method of buying privately created bank credit by the sale of bonds.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended because I want to ask him a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The gentleman indicated that in order to solve our difficulties we had to increase the purchasing power of the American people and have to change our monetary system. Do you not believe, from your study of the monetary system and purchasing power, that we should stop playing Santa Claus, stop purchasing billions of dollars of foreign gold at $35 an ounce, and putting purchasing power in the hands of foreign nations to carry on wars, and taking that purchasing power out of the hands of our American people?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Of course that is a big question to ask me when I only have 5 minutes left. I would like to make a speech for 20 minutes on that gold question. We are not taking the purchasing power out of the hands of the American people. We are doing exactly as we did in the twenties, when we made loans that were not repaid. We are making it possible to export more goods and services than we import, and unless we make constructive use of that gold in some monetary fashion, we do not really get paid for the goods we ship away.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Exactly, but when Americans were forced to turn in their gold for $20.67 an ounce or go to the jailhouse for 5 years, and then we imported from foreigners almost $12,000,000,000 of gold and paid them $35 an ounce, insofar as improving our economic situation and putting purchasing power in the hands of the people, it is like the old witch doctor trying to cure an active tuberculosis hemorrhage by taking a butcher knife and tapping some more blood out of the patient who has the hemorrhage.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. This problem of gold is a thorny one. It is not easy to answer as long as we are in the position that we find ourselves in today. Men can make pretty speeches about what the trouble is, but I have not yet found anybody who can tell me what the answer is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix and include therein a short bibliography of pamphlets and books on the unemployment problem.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and to include therein a very splendid address by a high-school girl in my district on citizenship.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

THE HATCH BILL

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a rather unwelcome and also unpopular duty. I listened to the speech by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] this afternoon. I happen to be one of those who signed that petition on the Speaker's desk, and I, for one, resent from the bottom of my heart the attack that he made on those of us who had the courage to sign that petition. I think we, as Members of this House, have the right, if committees refuse to report bills to the floor of the House, at least bills that are of the importance of the Hatch bill and other bills that I might mention, we have the right, and it is our duty as Members of this House to sign these petitions and bring these measures out on the floor. [Applause.]

I just wonder why sometimes we should listen to the lectures of some of these older Members. Who is this gentleman who lectured us this afternoon? He came from a State where in 1936 only 26 percent of the adult voters in that State voted——

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I have the figures here.

Mr. RAYBURN. I know; but there is some explanation necessary there.

Mr. HILL. I do not like to have the gentleman take up my time.

Mr. RAYBURN. I am going to stay with you. You can have all the time you want. I must make two unanimous-consent requests before adjournment.

Mr. HILL. Very well.

Mr. RAYBURN. If the gentleman will look at the primaries, he will see that probably a million people voted. It is a 1-party State, and people do not go to the general election. I had a Republican opponent the first time I ran for office, and he got 248 votes in 5 counties. There is no restriction on anybody voting in our State on account of race, color, previous condition of servitude, or anything else.

Mr. GEYER of California. How about the poll tax?

Mr. RALBURN. Anybody in our State, it matters not where he came from or where he is going, if he is a citizen, can vote on the same grounds that I can.

Mr. GEYER of California. If he has got the money.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. DEMPSEY] proposing the Hatch bill in the House comes from a State where 94 percent of the adult population vote, yet we have to sit here and be lectured for doing what we feel is our duty.

Who is the gentleman from Texas? He is a genial sort of man, but he is the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. Only 2 years ago without cause, because no measure was before the House, he got up on the floor of the House and said—read his speech—that he as chairman of that Committee on the Judiciary would not allow the Court bill to come on the floor of the House. He talks about dictatorship, and I ask what is more the act of dictatorship than for the chairman of that great committee to say to us on the floor of the House: "You must not consider this bill, you must not record your vote on this bill." Talk about dictatorship. I call that dictatorship. Now, he as one of the members of this committee, says that we must not have this Hatch bill upon the floor of the House to discuss its merits. He discussed the merits of the bill rather than the right of Members of this House to bring upon the floor bills that are of such importance that they may be discussed and voted on.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think my friend the gentleman from Washington will find if he reads the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] that the gentleman from Texas did not make an attack upon the men who signed that petition. I think he will find that is true.

Mr. HILL. If he revises his statement, probably it will not be in there.

Mr. RAYBURN. Oh, no.

Mr. HILL. But as I sat here and listened to him he quoted the Bible. I, too, can quote from the Bible. The Bible says that the man who calleth his brother a fool is in danger of hell fire. It seems to me that he charged us as being foolish and otherwise in asking that the Hatch bill be brought up for discussion. Others who were here when he spoke, I am sure, will substantiate this statement.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have sufficient time in which to complete his statement.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. I read here a headline in the Washington Post that President Roosevelt has asked for the passage of the Hatch bill. Would the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] include President Roosevelt as one opposed to democracy and not sufficiently intelligent to legislate or suggest good legislation?

Now, must we oppose the Hatch bill because the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the fount of wisdom at whose feet we must sit down to learn, says we cannot express ourselves? May we not have ideas of our own, and do what we want to do? For my part, I am sick and tired of that kind of procedure. I believe that the Members of the House have a right to their own views without being criticized and ridiculed.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The signers of the petition did not take any position on the Hatch bill but merely asked for its consideration by the House. After discussion, the defects which were pointed out by the gentleman from Texas, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, could be cured by amendment.

I am glad that the President favors the Hatch bill and I hope he supports the amendment which I intend to offer to prohibit President Roosevelt and Postmaster General Farley from shaking down the economic royalists to raise a $1,000,000 campaign fund by the sale of autographed books for $250 each in violation of the criminal laws of the several States and the Nation.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. MONRONEY. It was my pleasure to have signed this so-called petition to bring out the Hatch bill. During the entire course of the remarks by the gentleman from Texas I did not hear one disparaging word against a Member of this House who had signed that petition. The gentleman's remarks were addressed in criticism of the abuse the press had heaped upon the committee. I do not believe the gentleman from Texas was any more out of order in making his criticism of the bill than the gentleman from Washington is in making his criticism of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman is entitled to his viewpoint. I certainly cannot agree with him. We were ridiculed and told that we ought to be ashamed of ourselves. The rules of the House give us the right to sign a petition to bring that Hatch bill out for consideration on the floor of the House. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], and I listened to every word he said, and in my opinion he did not reflect in anywise upon any signer of this petition. What he was saying was in criticism of newspaper writers or editorial writers that this was the roll of honor; and he made the clear statement that he thought these newspapers intended to convey the impression that those Members who did not sign the petition were not going on the roll of honor. I think the gentleman from Washington will read in vain trying to find where the gentleman from Texas criticized anyone for signing that petition.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HILL. I think my hearing is fairly good. He ridiculed us time and again and said we ought to be ashamed to have signed the Hatch bill petition.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is not my understanding of what the gentleman said, but I am not going to enter into any controversy about that.

Mr. HILL. Well, I think my hearing is not defective.

Mr. RAYBURN. I did not say anything about the gentleman's hearing being defective.

Mr. Speaker, if the committees of Congress reported at this session of Congress every bill that has been introduced, we would never get through. When Members are interested in their bill they say that regardless of the feelings of the committee members the committee should report the bill. I imagine that if the 44 committees of the House were to report at this session of Congress all the bills that have been introduced, without another bill being introduced, the House of Representatives would be in continuous session all the way from 7 to 10 years to pass them. Committees do have functions, and they ought to perform those functions, and they ought to determine through independent judgment whether or not a bill should be reported. I think my friend from Washington, who is always fair, who is always intelligent, will find that he was a little bit mistaken about the criticism of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] may have permission to revise and extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN]?

There was no objection.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order for tomorrow, Calendar Wednesday, may be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOLAND]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I listened quite attentively to the gentleman from Washington when he said that he and other Members of Congress had a perfect right to sign the petition without being dictated to in any way. He said that dictator methods of the worst kind predominated with the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary.

I am wondering if he and the proponents of the Hatch bill realize that they are dictating to the employees of the Government and of States that participate either partly or in whole in Federal funds, their actions politically? I wonder if those Members realize for 1 minute that under the Hatch bill the Congress does delegate its powers to a commission, the Civil Service Commission, to define what pernicious political activity is? Congress gives away its power to an appointive body and that Commission defines, if you please, what pernicious political activity is.

Because of this situation, Mr. Speaker, I asked permission to address the House for 1 minute, and I want to state an experience I had a week ago last Tuesday in the Pennsylvania primaries. I ran into the situation that many of these people who are working on the W. P. A. did not come to the polls to vote because they were under the impression that if anyone at the polls talked to them about the candidate they would, in turn, lose their jobs. Now, we know that is not true, but you try to tell those people that, as we tried to do. They were afraid to vote because of the fear of being accused of political activities. They were afraid they would lose their jobs.

For my part I refused to accept the theory that the Civil Service Commission should be delegated the power to define what pernicious political activity is.

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD something from the Evening Post of New York.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. GEYER]?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. GEYER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, I wish to pay a tribute to nine Members of this House. As we all know, there is a section of the Nation embracing eight States where 64 percent of the white population and 94 percent of the colored are unable to vote. These 8 States send 78 Representatives to this body. It has often been said in this House that the vote of a man should not be questioned, as he must represent the majority of those who vote in his district or he will not remain long in political life. That I call good politics. Last week when we voted on the unprecedented rule to make in order the amendments to the wage-hour law we again expected our membership to vote as their voters at home desired them to vote. Since most of my voters work for a living, I naturally voted against the rule and thus against any changes in the act. That was good politics. You who come from strictly farming communities in many cases voted for the rule, for you felt the farmers, who constitute the majority of your voters, were not interested in the bill. That, too, was good politics. Most of the Representatives from the 8 poll-tax States voted for the rule, for those who vote in their States are the upper 10 percent and are largely employers of labor or they are controlled in their votes by having someone else pay the poll tax for them. This, again, was good politics. At least it must be considered so, for they have been casting this type of vote for many years and they lead in seniority in this House. From this poll-tax ridden section of the Nation, where democracy is unknown and those who toil are at the mercy of an oligarchy made up of privileged people, comes an example not of good politics but of good statesmanship. Nine men, hearing the cries of distress from their districts and believing in humanitarian principles, voted against the rule making in order the consideration of amendments to the wage-hour law.

This is so unusual coming from that section, for in the attack on every social measure these poll taxers seem always to lead the opposition. Of course, the Republican side of the House is only too glad to assist in the killing of any New Deal measure. That, too, is good politics for them. Let us see how it works. If this House desires to practice economy at the expense of the unemployed, it goes to Virginia for its high executioner of the W. P. A. It is safe for one from Virginia to kick the unemployed in the face, for those on relief are unable to pay the amount of tax and they have no recourse at the polls. If we want one to conduct a smear of the National Relations Board with a so-called investigation, we again go into the "cradle of democracy," the same State that furnished a long line of our first Presidents. Yes; the poll tax makes it safe to attack labor in Virginia. In the 1936 Presidential election Virginia voted but 25 percent of her adult population, while in comparison her neighbor, West Virginia, sent 92 percent to the polls. If we desire to scuttle the Fair Labor Standards Act, we look about for a leader, and immediately Georgia furnishes the man of the hour. His district sends him to the National Congress with less than 6,000 votes. Yes; it is safe to do that if you come from Georgia, for how can the one who works for a pittance pay poll taxes for every year since he was 21 years of age in order to vote? But 19 percent of the adult population of Georgia voted in 1936. Then there is the slum-clearance program. Where will a man be found to take the floor and eloquently plea, as he pounds the table, for votes to kill the program whereby the miserable slum dwellers may get out of their rat-infested firetraps? Another poll taxer stands ready to suffer political martyrdom for the cause of those who will, perhaps, lose profits if unable to pile several families in a space too small for one. Tennessee, "the Volunteer State," naturally produces the man. It is safe to ignore those who live in the slums in Tennessee, for they cannot pay a poll tax and thus become real citizens. Only 33 percent vote in Tennessee, while nearby Missouri, without the tax, has a voting percentage of 80. A check of those offering amendments weakening the Wage and Hour Act while under consideration shows that of all amendments offered by Democrats, by far the vast majority came from these eight poll-tax States, the very section where the law is most needed. Yet, in the face of these facts, there are those who would tell us that the poll-tax issue is a local issue. That those in other sections are meddling. My people are interested in greater social gains, and when these gains are always slowed up because it is good politics to consider only those in the higher-income brackets in certain States, then I say it is a matter of concern not only for those in my Seventeenth California District but for all people of the Nation. Soon we will have the bill before us that seeks to amend the Wagner Labor Act. The Democrats who will be most active in that battle, I predict, will hail from these same eight States, and the Republicans will use the usual strategy of allowing the Democrats to carry the ball. I maintain until the reconstruction of these eight States is completed and the majority of these citizens given their American birthrights of voting for their elected officials, progress for the submerged third will be very slow. I recommend to you the Geyer anti-poll-tax bill. In the meantime let us pay high honors to the nine statesmen from these districts.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, MAY 8, 1940

(Legislative day of Wednesday, April 24, 1940)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, as we enter the Holy of Holies through the sanctuary of prayer, fill us with the spirit of reverence and awe, and fix our minds on things eternal, that we may learn how dear we are to Thee, as Thou settest our feet upon the rock of Thy favor. Encourage in our hearts this day every good intent; cleanse our consciences, and stir our wills, that we may gladly serve the living God, who dost carry us from strength to strength.

Leave in us, dear Lord, no room for spiritual wickedness, no lurking place for secret sins, but so establish and sanctify us by Thy power that we give heed only to that which is right and, speaking the truth in love, may keep ourselves close to the lives of the great body of men, and, sharing alike their joys and sorrows, may follow in the steps of Him who made this world's ills His own, even Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. BARKLEY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day of Tuesday, May 7, 1940, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] is absent from the Senate because of illness.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] is unavoidably detained.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], the Senators from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS and Mr. PEPPER], the Senators from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT and Mr. NEELY], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] are necessarily absent.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce that my colleague the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] and the Senators from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES and Mr. TOBEY] are necessarily absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

REVISED REPORT ON LOGAN-WALTER BILL—SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTES WITH UNITED STATES

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting a revised report relative to the bill (S. 915) to provide for the more expeditious settlement of disputes with the United States, and for other purposes, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PETITIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution of the Pasadena (Calif.) Branch of the National Woman's Party, favoring the prompt adoption of the so-called equal-rights amendment to the Constitution, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate the petition of the city of Seward, Alaska, signed by the mayor thereof, praying for a congressional investigation of the entire Alaska Railroad situation, together with the Matanuska Farm Colony in the Territory of Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. WHEELER from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which was referred the resolution (S. Res. 259) authorizing the preparation of a supplement to the document on the Compilation of Federal Laws Relating to the Regulation of Carriers Subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1575) thereon.

Mr. TYDINGS, from the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9185) to amend section 73 of an act entitled "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii", approved April 30, 1900, as amended, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1576) thereon.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 175) to provide for the observance and celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of the Mississippi River by Hernando De Soto, reported it without amendment.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED

Mrs. CARAWAY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on today, May 8, 1940, that committee presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills:

S. 1542. An act to authorize the Director of the Geological Survey, under the general supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, to acquire certain collections for the United States;

S. 1780. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to acquire property for the Antietam Battlefield site in the State of Maryland, and for other purposes;

S. 3098. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to accept on behalf of the United States a bequest of certain personal property of the late Dudley F. Wolfe;

S. 3198. An act to provide allowances for uniforms and equipment for certain officers of the Officers' Reserve Corps of the Army;

S. 3262. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant a right-of-way to the Highway Commission of the State of Montana;

S. 3470. An act to amend the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, as amended, to provide for enlistments in the Army of the United States in time of war, or other emergency declared by Congress, and for other purposes;

S. 3633. An act to amend section 24e, National Defense Act, as amended, so as to add an alternative requirement for appointment in the Dental Corps;

S. 3654. An act to amend section 10, National Defense Act, as amended, with relation to the maximum authorized enlisted strength of the Medical Department of the Regular Army;

S. 3661. An act to amend the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, 1930, as amended, and for other purposes; and

S. 3675. An act to authorize the establishment of boundary lines for the Wilmington National Cemetery, N. C.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BILBO:

S. 3939. A bill to provide for the publication of a list of the owners of deposits in insolvent banks, trust companies, and other banking institutions in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. SCHWELLENBACH:

S. 3940. A bill to authorize the incorporated town of Sitka, Alaska, to purchase and enlarge certain public utilities, and for such purpose to issue bonds in the sum of $200,000 in excess of present statutory debt limit; to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. MALONEY:

S. 3941. A bill to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, to provide that the marketing quota provisions with respect to tobacco shall be applicable to Connecticut Valley shade-grown tobacco; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

(Mr. WHEELER introduced Senate bill 3942, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, and appears under a separate heading.)

(Mr. O'MAHONEY introduced Senate bill 3943, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

S. 3944. A bill for the relief of emergency officers with certain specified service; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. WILEY:

S. 3945. A bill to amend the Public Salary Tax Act of 1939 to grant relief to certain State employees from payment of Federal income taxes for taxable years beginning prior to January 1, 1939; to the Committee on Finance.

SACO DIVIDE UNIT, MILK RIVER PROJECT, MONTANA

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce, for proper reference and printing in the RECORD, a bill which was prepared and approved by the Bureau of Reclamation at the request of Mr. O. S. Warden, president of the National Reclamation Association. The bill is endorsed by the districts affected, and I shall press for its speedy consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 3942) authorizing allocation of funds for the construction of Saco Divide unit, Milk River project, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President, in making allocations from and pursuant to the item for water-conservation and utility projects contained in the Interior Department Appropriation Act, 1940, may allocate such amounts as he deems necessary for the construction of pumping and distribution facilities and land development for the Saco Divide unit of the Milk River project: Provided, That such amounts shall be reimbursed to the United States by the water users on the Saco Divide unit in not to exceed 40 annual installments, the first installment to begin in the year following the last payment made to the United States by the water users on the Saco Divide unit for that portion of the cost of the facilities common to the Saco Divide unit and other units of the Milk River project to be allocated by the Secretary of the Interior to the Saco Divide unit. Payments on account of those costs of said common facilities thus allocated shall be paid into the reclamation fund, and the component of such payments attributable to costs of construction prior to 1935 as determined by the Secretary of the Interior shall be credited to write-offs made on the Milk River project pursuant to the act of May 25, 1926 (44 Stat. 636).

JUDICIAL REVIEW IN CERTAIN CASES INVOLVING DISPOSITION OF THE PUBLIC LANDS

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, in the belief that in order to insure complete impartiality in the disposition of controversies between the Government and its citizens involving claims to the public lands, provision should be made for judicial review both as to law and fact in all cases in which the Government and the claimant have adverse proprietary interests. I introduce a bill to effectuate that purpose.

Until the creation of the national forests 30 years or more ago, the Land Department was an agency for the distribution of the public lands among the citizens. Controversies which came before it involved the conflicting claims of different citizens for the right to obtain title to a portion of the public domain. Mineral claimants and homestead claimants were contesting among themselves and the Land Department was involved solely as a judge to make certain that the rights claimed went to the applicant who had complied with the law.

In these conditions a great body of intradepartmental precedent was built up, and when cases were appealed from the Department to the courts, those tribunals held that the decision of the Land Department with respect to the facts in any particular case would not be reviewed, but that court action would be based only upon questions of law.

This was satisfactory enough when the cases involved only controversies among citizens. A great change, however, came with the creation of the national forests, the passage of the General Leasing Act, and more recently the passage of the Taylor Grazing Act. Under these new statutes the Government, as a government, has acquired a proprietary interest in the land, and many controversies now arise between the Government and the citizen, each having an adverse interest.

For example, the Government may wish to retain certain oil lands and dispose of them only by way of lease under which royalty is paid to the Government while the claimant may assert a title under the placer laws under which, if he has complied with the law, he is entitled to unrestricted ownership.

Obviously, in such a case the Government is no longer a disinterested umpire between rival claimants as formerly, but is now itself an interested party. In such cases it has seemed to me in all fairness the rule of law which makes the Land Department the final judge of the facts should be set aside and appeal should be allowed to the courts on both the law and the facts.

Under the bill which I am now introducing, the court is granted the power to review all questions of law and fact and when necessary to remand the case to the Department for a rehearing.

My attention was brought to this matter by the discussion in the Judiciary Committee over the so-called Walter-Logan bill, as well as by communications I have received with respect to certain cases initiated several months ago by the Interior Department against certain placer claims to oil lands in Lance Creek, Wyo.

While the Walter-Logan bill might deal with this matter by construction, it does not deal with it directly. Moreover, that bill contains many other provisions which raise serious questions as to its effect upon administrative matters which have nothing to do with cases of this kind. It seemed unlikely that this matter could be given proper consideration as part of that legislation.

I have discussed the general principle with Solicitor Margold of the Interior Department and have requested him to give study to this bill with the view of working out a formula which will preserve the essential rights of citizens to an impartial hearing by an impartial tribunal.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill of the Senator from Wyoming will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 3943) providing for judicial review in certain cases involving the disposition of the public lands was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the bill which I have just introduced reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding any other provision of law any party aggrieved by any determination, decision, or order of the Secretary of the Interior relating to the disposition of any part of the public domain within the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior and involving the proprietary rights or other direct and actual interests of the United States adverse to those of the party aggrieved may, within 30 days after receiving notice of such determination, decision, or order, institute proceedings for the review thereof by filing a written petition in the circuit court of appeals for the circuit in which the petitioner resides. A copy of such petition shall forthwith be served upon the Secretary of the Interior and thereupon the Secretary shall certify and file in the court a transcript of the record and evidence upon which the determination, decision, or order complained of was made. Upon such review such court shall have power to decide all questions of law and fact, and to affirm, modify, or reverse the determination, decision, or order complained of with or without remanding the case for a rehearing as justice may require. The judgment of any such court shall be final, except that it shall be subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States on certification or certiorari as provided in sections 230 and 240 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 28, secs. 346 and 347).

THE OBLIGATIONS OF LEADERSHIP—ADDRESS BY HON. LEWIS W. DOUGLAS (S. DOC. NO. 195)

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document an address delivered by Hon. Lewis W. Douglas before the Chamber of Commerce of the United States on Thursday, May 2, 1940, entitled, "The Obligations of Leadership."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, why should the address be made a public document? Does it cost more or less than to print it in the RECORD?

Mr. HAYDEN. I do not think the cost is materially different, but it is much easier to read when printed as a document.

Mr. CONNALLY. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arizona? The Chair hears none, and the address will be printed as a Senate document.

THIRD TERM FOR PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT—ADDRESS BY SENATOR LEE

[Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a radio address by Senator LEE at Oklahoma City, Okla., on Monday, April 29, on the subject, Third Term for President Roosevelt, which appears in the Appendix.]

MATTERS PRINTED IN RECORD ON REQUEST OF SENATOR ASHURST

[Mr. ASHURST asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD certain addresses delivered by him, certain letters written by him, and bills introduced by him which became laws, which appear in the Appendix.]

ADDRESS BY HON. JOSEPH E. DAVIES AT MADISON, WIS.

[Mr. SCHWELLENBACH asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered on May 5, 1940, by Joseph E. Davies, Special Assistant to the Secretary of State, at the banquet of the University of Wisconsin at Madison, Wis., in connection with ceremonies dedicating the university's new law library, which appears in the Appendix.]

ADDRESSES AT DEDICATION OF TABLET COMMEMORATING COOPERATION OF RAILROADS WITH THE GOVERNMENT IN 1917

[Mr. WHEELER asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD addresses in connection with the dedication at the Union Station, Washington, D. C., on April 26, 1940, of a bronze tablet commemorating the patriotic cooperation of American railroads with the Government and the services of the Railroad War Board in 1917, which appear in the Appendix.]

ADDRESS BY HON. NATHAN L. MILLER ON ADMINISTRATIVE LAW

[Mr. BURKE asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address on administrative law delivered by Hon. Nathan L. Miller, former Governor of New York, before the New York State Bar Association on July 2, 1938, which appears in the Appendix.]

SENATOR WHEELER AND THE PRESIDENCY

[Mr. CLARK of Idaho asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD editorial comment from the Milledgeville (Ga.) News of April 12, 1940, commenting on Senator WHEELER in connection with mention of his name as candidate for President, which appears in the Appendix.]

NAZI INFILTRATION IN THE BALKANS—ARTICLE BY DOROTHY THOMPSON

[Mr. WILEY asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an article by Dorothy Thompson entitled "Fifth Column on the March—Nazi Infiltration in the Balkans" published in the Washington Post of Wednesday, May 8, 1940, which appears in the Appendix.]

UNITED STATES AID TO ALLIES—ARTICLE BY LUDWELL DENNY

[Mr. REYNOLDS asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an article by Ludwell Denny on the subject of United States Aid to the Allies published in the Washington (D. C.) Daily News, which appears in the Appendix.]

PROHIBITION OF FOREIGN-SILVER PURCHASES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 785) to repeal the Silver Purchase Act of 1934, to provide for the sale of silver, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to what is known as the Pittman amendment.

CIVIL AERONAUTICS AUTHORITY AND AIR SAFETY BOARD

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, under my oath of office as a Senator, I feel compelled to place before the Senate and the people of the United States certain facts which, in my opinion, are an indictment of the Bureau of the Budget, and indicate the need for a thorough investigation of that Bureau by a joint committee of the Congress.

On last Saturday morning, May 4, 1940, there appeared in a New York newspaper the complete text of a confidential staff memorandum from the Bureau of the Budget to the President of the United States entitled "Summary of Civil Aeronautics Study."

This memorandum recommended transfer of the Civil Aeronautics Authority to the Department of Commerce, and various details of legislative reorganization of the Authority by the Chief Executive during the transfer.

This memorandum by the Bureau of the Budget is divided into four sections:

I. Redefinition of responsibilities between Authority and Administrator.

II. Reorganization of air safety functions.

III. Transfer to Department of Commerce.

IV. Desirability of effecting change at this time.

It is to the first three paragraphs of section 3, "Transfer to Department of Commerce," that I wish now to direct the attention of the Senate.

They disclose facts about the Bureau of the Budget which are shocking to me as a member of the Committee on Appropriations and of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

We of the Senate, and we, the members of the committees, have largely been of the opinion that financial accuracy, at least, could be expected of the Bureau of the Budget, even when we had good reason to suspect that it was not as familiar with the program of the President as it proclaimed itself to be.

It is now appallingly evident, from this confidential staff memorandum to the President, that the Bureau of the Budget not only does not know how to examine, prepare, and present even a simple budget, but, on top of that, is actually deficient in the simplest elements of bookkeeping and accounting.

and so plain that it is beyond dispute, denial, or excuse. In my judgment, and the judgment of impartial experts on accounting and budgetary practice, the fiscal statement of expenditures for civil aviation, contained in paragraph 2 of section 3 of the Bureau's report to the President, is a complete confession of inadequacy and incompetency to advise the President and the Congress on budgetary matters and the appropriation and expenditure of public funds.

I shall now read the full text of the paragraphs in the section of the Budget report to which I refer. The title is: "Transfer to Department of Commerce." I shall quote the text, sentence by sentence, item by item, and comment as I quote:

> The existing arrangement which places promotion and regulation of aviation entirely outside of the regular executive establishment can be looked upon only as a temporary device to be used during a transitional period.

This is, of course, purely an individual opinion of whoever wrote the report, and therefore of value only as such. Furthermore, it is a conclusion, disguised as a statement of fact, which is wholly unsupported by any facts offered by the writer of the memorandum, since obviously he could find no facts to support it.

The sentence is worthy of notice only because it reveals a theory of government which does not contemplate any sharp division and constitutional limitation of powers between the executive and legislative branches of our Federal Government. I remind the Senate that we set up the Civil Aeronautics Authority deliberately, and after long and careful study, to place the promotion and regulation of aviation entirely outside the regular executive establishment, and we did this by the suggestion and the wish and the will of the Executive himself. Furthermore, we certainly did not intend to set up "a temporary device," let alone one "to be used during a transitional period." In our representative American way, without benefit of bureau, we established what we assumed to be a permanent and progressive program for the future of a form of transport vital alike to the commerce, the defense, and the general welfare of the people of the United States. Correct me, Mr. President and gentlemen of the Senate, if I am wrong.

The next declaration of this remarkable and amazing document of the Bureau of the Budget reads as follows:

> The defense and commercial implications of civil aviation make it imperative that the President be currently apprised of any significant developments and that he at all times be in a position to integrate this function with related governmental activities.

That sentence sounds as if it has been written by one recently promoted from the freshman class of law school to the dignity of sophomore standing.

I trespass upon the time of the Senate to discuss this absurd sentence only because the sentence is supposed to set the stage for what follows. If civil aviation needs any defense, it is only against those who would now return it to the evil conditions and the unhappy days it knew when it was under the Department of Commerce. Since those who are commercially interested in aviation, especially those who are interested in it as business users of the mails, are thoroughly satisfied to have an independent Civil Aeronautics Authority directly under the supervision of the Congress of the United States, I am utterly at a loss to understand, as I am sure you must be, exactly what might be meant by such a meaningless phrase as the "commercial implications of civil aviation." Furthermore, if the President of the United States has not been "currently apprised of any significant developments" these last 2 years, then Mr. Noble was not only derelict to his duty as Chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Authority but also, as Under Secretary of Commerce, could not be entrusted with any supervision of a civil aeronautics board, Mr. Hinckley is not qualified either to be Chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Authority now or perhaps Assistant Secretary of Commerce later; and the Bureau of the Budget could not possibly, by any stretch of charity, be said to have told us the truth when we were given the justifications for the Civil Aeronautics appropriations for 1940 and 1941, and were assured that these appropriations were "in accord with the program of the President."

A President not "currently advised of any significant developments" in a fast-moving and dynamic form of public transport of such vital importance to the future as civil aviation has obviously been in no position to pass upon a budget to be submitted to this Congress or any previous Congress or session of Congress. If the President were not so "apprised," then the fault lies directly at the door of individuals, and of the Bureau of the Budget, because the Congress, in enacting the law establishing the Civil Aeronautics Authority, placed no barriers of communication between the Authority and the Executive and the Bureau of the Budget. Furthermore, we have been assuming, obviously with no reason, in the light of recent developments, that the Bureau of the Budget was fulfilling its duties under the law and making a competent analysis of the fiscal affairs of the Civil Aeronautics Authority, on the basis of which we could safely appropriate the money for that Authority to spend in the public interest, necessity, and convenience.

Let me say to the Senate, Mr. President, that there is far more, or, at least, there should be far more, to the operations of a budget bureau than merely the routine of a small group of high-salaried and ostensibly well-qualified gentlemen sitting in pontifical array around the head of an expensive walnut conference table, nodding with reserved and dignified approval or frowning with the omniscient thunder glance of Jove, as some skulking wretch of an executive from an agency created by Congress appears before them to beg the money which later, with an almost jaunty confidence, he requests of Congress.

The examination, determination, and final statement of a budget is a job to be entrusted only to experts, qualified by previous experience in the preparation of budgets equivalent in size and complexity to the budgets they are required to examine, determine, and certify. Note, please, Mr. President, that I say "certify." When an executive department of the Government, or some other agency, sends to us a report on a bill concluding with the sentence, "It has been ascertained from the Bureau of the Budget that this is in accord with the program of the President," or, "It has been ascertained from the Bureau of the Budget that this is not in accord with the program of the President," it has been confidently accepted, and we have assumed that this decision was also a certification by a bureau of budgetary experts. It has been the common assumption that there had been thorough examination and determination by personnel qualified from experience with Budgets of similar size and complexity, on whose approval or disapproval we could confidently rely. Yet, look at the staggering revelation of the contrary situation accidentally revealed to us in the past few days.

We have learned that for a long time prior to last December 4, 1939, disquieting news relating to the Civil Aeronautics Authority had been, we are now informed, reaching the President from unnamed and unidentified sources. We are now told, further, that for 5 months, beginning December 4, 1939, the Bureau of the Budget, by order of the President, mind you—not of its own initiative or discovery, but by order of the President—has been conducting a confidential survey of the Civil Aeronautics Authority, culminating in its recommendation that the Authority be transferred to the Department of Commerce. Certain unpleasant facts obviously emerge from such a disclosure.

The first question which suggests itself is, if the President were not being "currently apprised of any significant developments," how did he know last autumn that seemingly all was not well in the Civil Aeronautics Authority? If he had access to such information then, what gain could there possibly be by a transfer to the Department of Commerce? And how does it happen that the Bureau of the Budget was not then aware of these same facts—facts which should have had a vital bearing on its determination of the budget for the Civil Aeronautics Authority which the Bureau recommended to us in December 1939? A budget must be spent by individuals in charge of an organization. The determination of a budget and its certification depend in no small measure on the qualifications of those who are to spend it and the circumstances under which they will spend it. If the Bureau of the Budget had not determined these factors last autumn, it committed a public scandal when it certified to us in December and January that the budget for the Civil Aeronautics Authority was "in accord with the program of the President," and therefore by implication assured us that we should vote appropriations for the continuance of the Civil Aeronautics Authority under its existing set-up. If the Bureau of the Budget was right then, it is wrong now. If it did not recognize, study, or know last autumn what would produce efficiency and economy for the Civil Aeronautics Authority, it has forfeited all right to be listened to now or any acceptance of any recommendations it has now made to the President as published in the New York press last Saturday.

Mr. President, I shall proceed now to the second paragraph of the section of the Bureau of the Budget's confidential report to the President setting forth alleged reasons for a transfer of the Civil Aeronautics Authority to the Department of Commerce. This second paragraph contains the budgetary meat of the entire matter, and contains also a shocking revelation of the Bureau of the Budget's apparent inability to handle accurately the simplest problems in bookkeeping, accounting, and budgeting.

This second paragraph consists of one long sentence, to which is appended a table purporting and attempting to set forth the estimated expenditures in 1940 for civil aviation. I shall read first and analyze the sentence which opens the paragraph, and then read and analyze the table of expenditures, which reveals the utter ineptitude and unreliability of the Bureau of the Budget as a dependable source of examination, determination, and certification, at least in any fiscal matters relating to civil aviation.

The opening sentence of the second paragraph is as follows:

> The need for establishing and maintaining such a relationship (integrating civil aviation with related governmental activities) may be better appreciated if it is realized that the estimated Federal expenditures which will be incurred during the current fiscal year for civil aviation total more than $108,000,000, which total is made up of the following items.

I draw your attention, Mr. President, to the fact that the Bureau of the Budget has informed the Chief Executive of the United States, by this sentence, that he will gain a better appreciation of the need for transferring the Civil Aeronautics Authority to the Department of Commerce if he will just realize that more than $108,000,000 are to be spent this year by the Federal Government for civil aviation.

Obviously, if the President of the United States will gain a better appreciation of the need for this proposed transfer by examining the figures presented by the Bureau of the Budget, it is not unreasonable to suppose that the Congress of the United States might gain a like appreciation by a similar examination.

Regrettably for the reputation of the Bureau of the Budget, an accountancy examination and budgetary study of the figures the Bureau presents serve only to destroy the case it attempts to make out for the transfer of the Civil Aeronautics Authority to the Department of Commerce, and to damage almost beyond repair any confidence the Congress may have had in the reliability of the Bureau of the Budget as an agency of information and guidance to the Congress on any legislative matter involving appropriations.

At this point, Mr. President, I send to the desk, and ask to have read by the clerk, the table of 1940 estimated expenditures offered by the Bureau of the Budget in its confidential memorandum to the President as a vital reason for the transfer of the Civil Aeronautics Authority to the Department of Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

1940 estimated expenditures

Civil Aeronautics Authority [1]	$25,518,000
W. P. A. and P. W. A. funds for airport construction and for C. A. A. emergency relief administration expenses	43,901,992
Total C. A. A., W. P. A., P. W. A.	69,419,992
Domestic air-mail deficiency	8,260,000
Foreign air-mail deficiency	6,293,000
Weather Bureau: Airway weather service and research	3,469,000
Total net expenditures [2]	87,441,992
Air-mail expenditures offset by revenues	20,600,000
Total gross expenditures	108,041,992

[1] Includes $4,000,000 civilian-pilot training program.
[2] Includes National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics and Army, Navy, and Coast Guard.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I wish to draw to the attention of the Senate the fact that the exact sum, as alleged by the Bureau of the Budget, is only a trifle more than $108,000,000. It is $108,041,992.

In the next place, I direct the attention of the Senate to the astounding fact that this budgeted statement of expenditures contains a startling error of precisely $20,600,000.

I submit, Mr. President, that any fiscal agency of the Government that can make an error of $20,600,000, in one out of six items which total $108,000,000-plus, is obviously a cause for our alarmed attention.

Without any further scrutiny of its figures, such an agency is 19 percent wrong to begin with—and when 19 percent represents $20,600,000 of the public's money, we have a serious situation.

This gross and obvious error occurs as item 6 of the expense budget just read from the desk. The item reads as follows:

Air-mail expenditures offset by revenues	$20,600,000

Obviously, if the expenditures for air mail are offset by revenues, as stated by the Bureau of the Budget, they should either not be included in any total of expenditures, or, if included, then the corresponding offset of $20,600,000 should be deducted from the gross total. This is such elementary bookkeeping that I feel I should apologize to the Senate for even bringing it to its attention. I emphasize it only because the correction of this gross error reduces the actual total of expenditures from $108,041,992 to $87,441,992.

However, this is only a beginning at uncovering the errors in the Budget's statement to the President, and by him in turn made available to the press. I shall proceed now to a brief examination and disclosure of the other errors, equally startling and disturbing as issuing from the Bureau of the Budget.

The second obvious error occurs in item 2, which reads:

W. P. A. and P. W. A. funds for airport construction and for C. A. A. emergency relief administrative expenses $43,901,992

It is evident at a glance that the largest part of this sum of $43,901,992, in any system of budgeting and bookkeeping, would be offset by a credit to capital account, since obviously it represents investment and not expense. By no conceivable figment of accountancy imagination could this total be debited in its entirety against civil aviation. By what devious process the Bureau of the Budget could arrive at the conclusion that it should charge this whole sum of $43,901,992 against civil aviation, I am not clairvoyant enough to perceive.

Merely for sake of reasonable correction of the error, I will charge off more than half that total to direct expense, and say that no more than $20,000,000 should be credited to capital account as a permanent investment. In other words, for the purpose of speculative discussion, I shall assume—although obviously the assumption is fictitious—that the remaining $23,901,992 was direct expense.

This yields another $20,000,000 of erroneous debit, which actually is a credit, and therefore must be deducted from the sum total of expenditures. Making this second deduction, the corrected total is now reduced to $67,441,992, instead of the original total alleged by the Bureau of the Budget to be $108,041,992.

Now we come to the third error. The Bureau of the Budget states that among the estimated expenditures for civil aviation in 1940 is an item which reads:

Domestic air-mail deficiency $8,260,000

Presumably this estimate was derived from the cost-ascertainment report of the Post Office Department. If so, the Bureau of the Budget is almost 3 years behind the times, because the Interstate Commerce Commission, almost 3 years ago, in Air Mail Docket No. 19, rejected and disapproved the cost-ascertainment system of the Post Office Department as a wholly inaccurate and useless method for measuring air-mail costs. The Civil Aeronautics Authority quite properly has followed the Interstate Commerce Commission in setting up and using the cost-ascertainment system approved and recommended by the Commission. The actual deficiency is nowhere near $8,260,000. As a matter of fact, even using the post-office cost-ascertainment system which both the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Civil Aeronautics Authority reject, the alleged deficit would be less than $3,000,000—$2,834,063.13, to be exact. This is arrived at by deducting the 1939 revenue from domestic air mail, which was $16,326,358.27, from the 1939 expenditures, which were $19,160,421.40. I should note that of this $19,000,000 of expenditures, $609,990.47 represents payments to air-mail carriers due on 1937 and 1938 accounts.

Further in analyzing this domestic air-mail deficiency alleged by the Bureau of the Budget, Senators must remember that air mail has steadily increased in volume of patronage by the public so that it is not only at its all-time peak this year, but is rapidly reaching the saturation point at the 6-cent rate and may have to be reduced to 5 cents in 1941, in line with modern merchandising methods for opening up new levels of consumers and additional patronage. Evidence of this can be found in the fact that air-mail revenues from postage increased approximately $3,000,000 from 1936 to 1937, another $3,000,000-plus from 1937 to 1938, and only a little more than $1,000,000 from 1938 to 1939. Even with only a million-dollar increase the air mail came within $299,115.63 of breaking even—it took in $16,326,358.27 in postage, and paid out $16,625,473.90 for transportation, including that portion of the air mail which had to be sent by railroad.

Obviously, Mr. President, instead of the estimated air-mail deficiency for domestic mail being any such ridiculous figure as $8,260,000, the most that could be conceded—even on the highly questionable basis of using the post office cost-ascertainment method—would be not more than $3,000,000, which in my opinion is about $500,000 too generous and too high. Therefore, instead of the figure used by the Bureau of the Budget, which is obviously erroneous, we should use $3,000,000. The difference of $5,260,000 must again be deducted from the Bureau of the Budget total of expenditure, now reducing it still further to $62,181,992, instead of the preposterous $108,041,992.

I trust the Senate will bear with me, because we are not yet done, Mr. President, with exploring this quagmire, this "Dismal Swamp," of the Bureau of the Budget accounting for the finances of civil aviation.

One of the devices of befuddled and inexpert accounting is to bury in footnotes all embarrassing and perplexing items for which incapacity and lack of experience can offer no solution on correct bookkeeping and accurate budget analysis.

I now draw the attention of the Senate to such a footnote, in the statement of the Bureau of the Budget which we are now examining.

This footnote leads to the item "Total net expenditures," whose sum is $87,441,992.

The footnote reads:

This includes National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, and Army, Navy, and Coast Guard.

To my mind, this is the most disgraceful and shocking of all the revelations already disclosed by this amazing statement. Nowhere, in any of the items listed to make up the total of $87,000,000 plus for "Total net expenditures" can we find any clue or hint which offers even a suggestion as to what part of this total represents expenditures this year for the National Advisory Committee, the Army, the Navy, the Coast Guard. What puzzles me is, how did the Bureau of the Budget forget to put in the Marine Corps? As I recall, they fly airplanes too.

Even with all our study, which has already cut the total of estimated real expenditures from $108,041,992 to $62,181,992, we still do not know how much further to cut it down, since the Bureau of the Budget gaily lumps Army, Navy, Coast Guard, and National Advisory Committee into a mere footnote. After all, Mr. President, what are a few millions to the Bureau of the Budget? All we are expected to do is to vote these millions as appropriations and ask no embarrassing questions based on proper bookkeeping and budgeting. Is this, too, in accord with the program of the President?

Mr. President, I am sure I express the sentiments of the majority of the Members of the Senate when I say that the time has come when we must examine into the Bureau of the Budget, if necessary, by a joint congressional committee of investigation. We owe a duty to ourselves, as well as to each citizen of the United States, under our oath of office, to ascertain the facts, and to take such corrective action as we believe to be necessary. We have been affronted by the mere presentation of such a statement as the one offered by the Bureau of the Budget as justification for Reorganization Plan IV.

I wish to read to the Senate, in conclusion, the final of the three paragraphs to which I referred in the beginning of my remarks, the paragraph which follows the utterly erroneous budgetary expense analysis by the Bureau of the Budget which I have just examined with the Senate. I quote:

This vast sum, $108,041,992, definitely negates the thought that in dealing with civil aviation the Federal Government is concerned with a purely private endeavor. On the contrary, air commerce is vitally dependent upon the tremendous financial assistance given by the Federal Government.

To me, that statement is the crowning absurdity of all the budgetary errors and absurdities we have just examined. If the Bureau of the Budget is obviously almost 50 percent wrong in its arithmetic and budgeting, then the sentence I have just read is at least 50 percent wrong, because it is based on the Bureau of the Budget's own palpably incorrect accountancy. As a matter of fact, the whole argument of the Bureau of the Budget, based on its own arithmetic, crashes to the ground because there is nothing to support it.

Fortunately we have made this discovery in time. The Congress of the United States created the Bureau of the Budget—the Congress can still review it and revise it into a dependable agency of information. In the light of the revelations disclosed by the confidential memorandum of the Bureau of the Budget to the President of the United States, published last Saturday morning in the New York press, the time has come for review of the Bureau and, in all human likelihood, a sweeping revision.

Mr. President, I have brought this matter to the attention of the Senate because the Senate should know what absurdities are behind the movement which induced the Executive to send to Congress Executive Order No. IV. I want the Senate to know, in no uncertain terms, that statement after statement, fallacious in nature, has been made to the Chief Executive, which has brought about the unfortunate, unworthy, and much-regretted Executive Order No. IV.

Mr. President, today the country is looking to the Congress of the United States, because the Congress of the United States, after 5 years of study, gave to the country a law upon which it could rely, gave to the aviation industry a law upon which it could depend, and gave to the Nation a stability in aviation activity which put it in the advance guard of the nations of the world. Today we are looking at blasted and blighted countries abroad, and we are looking to a future in which this country will lead the nations of the world if civilization is to prevail. We can best lead the nations of the world in that path if, after having studied so vital a subject, we come forward with a law which has written into it a symmetry which makes so successful the art, the science, and the industry of aviation that all the world stands to look on and see the results.

Sixty-four million dollars of expenditure is all that can be chargeable to us so far as aviation is concerned—$64,000,000 of expenditure to fly 86,000,000 plane-miles and 821,000,000 passenger-miles over the broad expanse of this country. Woud anyone say that the expenditure of $64,000,000 of Federal money—if it be that amount—is such an excessive sum that the agency which brought about this notable result—so notable that even the President himself last December commended the agency for its work—should be discarded? If the law which brought about this notable result has worked symmetrically, harmoniously, and economically, why should it be torn down and destroyed, thus bringing about a condition in which no one within the Civil Aeronautics Authority will know what anything means?

Why should we send civil aviation back to the very agency out of which disaster after disaster came? Why should we send it back to the agency which brought about crash after crash, destruction after destruction? Why should we send it back to the agency which had control of it when every air line in America was working in the red, whereas today, for the first time in history, the air lines of America are on a paying basis?

These are questions which I propound to my colleagues of the Senate ere they cast their votes upon this all-important measure by way of a resolution which I hope will come from the Committee on Reorganization this afternoon.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. KING. Is it the Senator's view that the Federal Government should subsidize aviation? If it should subsidize aviation—which, of course, is in competition with the railroads—to be fair, does the Senator think there should be a subsidy for the railroads?

Mr. McCARRAN. In the first place, Mr. President, let me say that the interrogatory of the able Senator from Utah is propounded on a false premise. We have not subsidized aviation. The fact of the matter is that we are making money out of the mail. We are not only making money out of the mail itself, but we are bringing money to the country out of the mail by increasing business and speeding up human activities. By giving guarantees of payment to the air lines for carrying the mail we have done more for business and commerce than we have done by any other activity upon which we have ever embarked. Furthermore, as I tried to point out in my remarks a few moments ago, we are approaching the point where the charge for air mail will be reduced. In all probability we shall have a rate of 5 cents for carrying an ounce of air mail across the country. So the second part of the interrogatory of the able Senator falls, because we are not subsidizing aviation, and I will not concede that we are subsidizing it.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. McCARRAN. Certainly.

Mr. KING. In the opinion of the Senator, is there greater efficiency under the present organization than there would be under the organization suggested by the reorganization plan, keeping in mind the progress which has been made, the advantages which have been derived, and the lessons which experience has taught? Is the present organization more efficient and more economical than would be the organization suggested by the reorganization plan?

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, if I did not think so I would not be pleading with my colleagues in the Senate. If I did not feel it from the very bottom of my heart, after 6 years of study in which I have devoted almost my entire thought to this subject, I would not be saying what I am saying. If I did not believe that efficiency would be more certainly brought about by the present independent agency than by throwing that agency into chaos and into a political department of the Government, I would not be here contending as I am.

Mr. KING. May I ask one other question of the Senator?

Mr. McCARRAN. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Because I put it in the interrogative form does not mean that I am expressing or attempting to express any opinion. Does not the Senator believe that efficiency, after all, is promoted by having a centralized authority with respect to governmental agencies than by allowing each of the governmental agencies too much authority, too much discretion, and too much power?

Mr. McCARRAN. The suggestion and question of the able Senator from Utah open a wide field. I do not propose at this time, in view of the fact that I am advised that the Senator from Oklahoma desires the floor, to go into the lengthy answer that could be made to the Senator's question, but let me answer it as briefly as I can.

This agency has now been in existence for a little more than a year; it has proven its efficiency, for in that year there has been accomplished in transportation the greatest feat the history of civilization records. I will go back even to oxcart days, and say that history does not record another such instance of the utter absence of fatality to human beings or to property for an equal length of time as that which may be credited to the activities of the Civil Aeronautics Authority. When we have efficiency of that kind, would it not be an economic loss to tear down that efficient instrument, even though, for the mere sake of the argument, it should be admitted that some other instrumentality probably could operate as well. The mere change, the blighting of hope, the destruction of faith and confidence in this new agency, which already has planned for itself another year of activity, could not fail to have a most detrimental effect.

One thought has been uppermost in my mind, above all other thoughts, in considering this matter, and that is I would regret to be at the head of the Department of Commerce if this agency were transferred to that Department and crashes or a series of crashes should ensue. May God have mercy on the man who will be at the head of the Department of Commerce under such circumstances. Yet we are moving headlong into action which may bring about such a condition.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator has made a very important statement at the conclusion of his last remarks. I should like to know what difference there would be in the handling of aviation in this country under the Secretary of Commerce, in the event this activity should be transferred to that Department, as compared with the manner in which it is being handled at the present time under the Safety Board and the Board of Control and the executive officer who handles the administrative end of it.

Mr. McCARRAN. I will try to answer the question as briefly as possible. First of all, the Safety Board would go out of existence——

Mr. LUCAS. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. McCARRAN. Let me develop that, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. LUCAS. Very well.

Mr. McCARRAN. May I, with apologies, say that I had to do with the creation of the Safety Board and in writing the law?

Mr. LUCAS. Will the Senator yield there?

Mr. McCARRAN. Very well, though I wanted to finish the thought.

Mr. LUCAS. Pardon me. Let the Senator proceed. I want him to finish, and I regret that I interrupted him.

Mr. McCARRAN. The Safety Board is an independent agency within the Civil Aeronautics Authority. The reason for that is that if the Civil Aeronautics Authority had the power to control the Safety Board, then the mistakes that might be made by the Authority itself would be whitewashed by the agency that would undertake investigation. We had such a situation time after time during the former regime. Crashes and break-ups occurred and deaths resulted, but every time an investigation was brought about, somebody did not want to lay the blame on somebody else in the organization, so the whitewash brush was applied.

If the Senator remembers the investigation made by the late Senator Copeland and his able committee, he will recall that the fact was brought out that if the authority then in control, which was the Bureau of Air Commerce in the Department of Commerce, undertook an investigation, there would be no result. So, in order to bring about results from the investigations—for there is no use of an investigation unless some result is derived therefrom—we set up an independent board, of which one member at least should be an experienced pilot. Such a board was created.

The argument—and I am digressing somewhat, but will come back to the Senator's question—the argument has been made that there was friction in the Safety Board. I will express two thoughts on that subject. The very fact that there was not harmony and accord in the Safety Board may be one of its greatest compliments, for when they are too much in harmony there may not be sufficient scrutiny. On the other hand, we find there have been only two members on the Board for the past many months. That being true, I say, from such investigation as I have been able to make, that there was complete harmony between those two men. The result has been the setting up of safety devices, the demand for safety appliances, and the presentation of reasons for accidents. All the accidents which have occurred have been in private flying, not in commercial flying, and they have served to bring to the attention of the Safety Board conditions which have encouraged the Authority to adopt certain regulations and certain devices so that such accidents would not occur again.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, now will the Senator yield again?

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes, gladly. I want to cover everything the Senator desires. If I have failed to do so, and if he will ask me again, I will be glad to endeavor to answer him.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator has done very well in his attempt, but I should like to know for myself what are the functions of the Safety Board. I have been given to understand that all the Safety Board does is to investigate accidents after they occur; then to make its recommendations to the Civil Aeronautics Authority as to what the Safety Board believes should be done about it, and then the Authority must either take the recommendations or leave them, just as they see fit. Am I correct in my understanding of the matter?

Mr. McCARRAN. No; I am sorry to say the Senator is not altogether correct.

Mr. LUCAS. Will the Senator enlighten me, please?

Mr. McCARRAN. I will endeavor to do so. The purpose of the Safety Board was set out in the law. I have not the time to read it.

Mr. LUCAS. Let the Senator state the situation briefly.

Mr. McCARRAN. The duties of the Safety Board are to examine into any catastrophe or wreck or accident that may happen.

Mr. LUCAS. Is the Senator talking about the three members of the Safety Board?

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes; about the three members of the Safety Board and the agents who are employed by them. Their report is then submitted to the whole Safety Board. Then the Safety Board makes their findings as to the cause of the disaster, whatever it may have been, and in making their findings as to the cause they disclose how the cause may be obviated. That whole report is sent to the Administrator, who, in his turn, sees to it, and must see to it, if he complies with the law, that the appliances which the Safety Board recommends are immediately installed and that the regulations which the Safety Board recommends are immediately promulgated, or that whatever condition it was that gave rise to the accident is remedied, so that such an accident will not occur again. That is the function performed by the Administrator. Then his act, in turn, may be reviewed by the five-man board, which is known as the Authority, headed by Mr. Hinckley.

Mr. LUCAS. In other words, as it is being operated at the present time, the Safety Board, after an accident, makes its recommendations and findings, and they are delivered over to the executive officer?

Mr. McCARRAN. For carrying out.

Mr. LUCAS. For carrying out; but, at the same time, the board of five have a right to veto what the executive officer of the Safety Board may do?

Mr. McCARRAN. No; I cannot go that far with the Senator.

Mr. LUCAS. What is the power, then, of the board of five?

Mr. McCARRAN. The board of five has the power to limit the expenditures by the executive officer.

Mr. LUCAS. Do they not have power to make rules and regulations?

Mr. McCARRAN. They have power to direct the Administrator to carry out the recommendations of the Safety Board.

Mr. LUCAS. Can the Senator enlighten me upon this—and I ask for information, merely because there is nothing so far as any hearings are concerned or any information I have, which gives me a concrete knowledge upon this very important subject. I may ask some strange questions, and, if I do, I wish the Senator to forgive me.

Mr. McCARRAN. I merely wish to say to the Senator, please do not misunderstand me as being captious at all, but the law, in my judgment, is so plain that any doubt the Senator may have in his mind will be immediately dispelled by a reading of it.

Mr. LUCAS. But that is the point which I understand is being constantly debated and discussed between the three different groups which are in the aeronautics set-up at the present time. In other words, it is my understanding that no one of the three groups can agree as to what their duties are in regard to many important matters.

Mr. McCARRAN. If the Senator has received that information, let me say to him that a very close study has not given me any such reaction.

Mr. LUCAS. Can the Senator advise me as to this matter? I have received information—it is merely information, and there may be nothing to it—that the executive officer and the Air Safety Board and the board of five have investigated the same accident and made their own conclusions and findings, and claimed that under the law they had a right to do so.

Mr. McCARRAN. I would not be able to answer as to that, because I do not know. I never heard of it, so I do not know.

Mr. LUCAS. If the Senator can give me any information on that subject, I should like to have it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I cannot give the Senator from Illinois any information about that matter, but I rose to suggest that even that would be far preferable to the old system, under which the very men who were responsible for safety and for safety regulations investigated themselves.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator's conclusions may be correct.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. For instance, in the case of the Cutting accident, in which the flight was in two sections, the first section was held up as it approached Kansas City, and not permitted to land and not able to land, because the Department, for reasons of its own, had turned off the radio beam for the purpose of broadcasting weather information. It was necessary for the first section to circle the city of Kansas City four separate times and for the pilot to work out his orientation problem four separate times, with the result that it took the first section 22 minutes to land instead of 2 minutes. When the second section, on which Senator Cutting was a passenger, and a man by the name of Bolton was the pilot, approached Kansas City, it was then too late for the pilot to land, and he was directed to go off on the Burlington leg of the beam, which proved to be 11 miles off its course. The beam had swung 11 miles, which resulted in the Cutting accident. In other words, there were two separate charges of negligence, and certain other additional ones, against the Department of Commerce; but the Department of Commerce investigated itself. It investigated its own responsibility for the accident; and in order to divert attention and responsibility from itself, it fined the pilot of the first section, which had landed at Kansas City, $500, and laid the blame for the accident to the second section on the pilot who was dead.

I say that, even if there are now three different agencies conducting investigations, it is a far preferable condition to one in which the Bureau authorities in the Department of Commerce investigated themselves.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] has the floor.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I am not debating the question whether or not this plan is preferable to the old system. The only thing I am trying to do is to get some information about this subject, and as to why Reorganization Plan No. IV is up here, and I merely rose to ask the Senator for what I believe to be proper information.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I should like to comment upon the question.

Mr. LUCAS. I do not have the floor.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. I want the Senator to finish, but the Senator's specific comment was that he had some information of an instance in which the Authority, the five-man Board, the Administrator, and the Air Safety Board all investigated the same accident, and all disagreed among themselves. Of course, I do not know what accident the Senator could have had in mind, because there have not been any accidents for over a year except minor ones; but the Senator's information—I say this a priori, because I do not know the specific facts upon which the statement is based—very likely is wrong, for the very simple reason that the Civil Aeronautics Authority, the big Board, has no personnel with which to investigate accidents. It has no inspectors. It has no investigators. It determines policies; it determines airline franchises, and all those things.

The Administrator has executive officers who are in the field, but those officers have to do with the maintenance of the safety system of the country—the beacons, the radio ranges, the airways—and certainly if he used those men to investigate an accident, he did so without any authority whatever. It is possible, of course, that some of his men may have been in the vicinity of an accident, and they may have gone to the scene of the accident to satisfy themselves.

The Air Safety Board is the only Board which has employees and investigators who can be used to investigate an accident under any circumstances, unless somebody else just happens to be there; so that I say very likely the information which the Senator received was incorrect. There has been no fatal accident. There have been only two or three little landing accidents, such as the one in which a plane skidded on some ice down here in Illinois, or something of that kind; and if those accidents were investigated by three bodies it would be very, very unusual.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. The argument made by the able Senator from Idaho convinces me more and more that there are very few individuals in the United States Senate who know exactly what these different individuals of the three groups are doing insofar as this particular Authority is concerned. It strikes me, as one who wants to vote intelligently upon the proposition now before the Senate, that we are totally lacking in information as to the basic reasons for the proposed transfer from the Civil Aeronautics Authority over to the Secretary of Commerce, and the Senator from Illinois is very desirous of obtaining more information as to the real reasons for the proposed transfer.

Mr. McCARRAN. I will say to the Senator that that is what I have been trying to obtain.

Mr. LUCAS. All right. If there is something within the Air Safety Board and the executive office and the five-man board that is vital to the future welfare or detriment of aviation, it strikes me that the Senate ought to know about it. So far there is no information of any kind or character before the Senate of the United States, outside of statements made by Senators on the floor of the Senate and made by Members of the House upon the floor of the House, as to what this important measure is all about; and, for myself, I must have some information from the individuals in the departments in the form of testimony before some particular committee. I want information directly from the mouths of those who know the problems of this department. I must know more about this matter before I can intelligently cast a vote one way or the other.

That is all the Senator from Illinois is interested in. I want to be right upon this question, because I consider it a most important question from many angles, including the safety of air passengers and the national defense.

Mr. McCARRAN. I think the Senator has overlooked one thing in his statement, in which he says there is no evidence before the Senate or before him on this matter. There is, if the Senator will consider it, nearly 13 months of active work on the part of this agency, which work has been done with 100-percent efficiency.

Mr. LUCAS. I appreciate that statement made by the Senator; and there cannot be any question but that those who are now considering the matter must give it a considerable amount of weight. That is one of the reasons why I say it is difficult for me to understand, under all the circumstances and all the facts that have existed since this Board has been in operation, why the reorganization order is requested at this particular time. If there is something in the background that is more vital to the country than the continued safety of these men, I am one who wants to know about it; and I sincerely hope that in some way, somehow, the individuals who know about the basic and fundamental things now existing in the Civil Aeronautics Board shall divulge the information to a proper committee.

Mr. McCARRAN. Will tell why it should be changed?

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct. I think we are entitled to know that, and I think the Senator will agree with me that we are entitled to know it.

Mr. McCARRAN. I think so. I have tried to find out.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point for a question?

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Reference has frequently been made to a fact of which we all are proud, and which makes us happy—that there have been no fatal airplane accidents within the past 13 months. Nobody can tell, of course, whether or not that would have happened under any other circumstances; but, specifically, what has the Air Safety Board done that has prevented such accidents? As I understand, their chief function is to investigate an accident after it happens, and to report the cause, and make recommendations as to how similar accidents may be prevented. Can the Senator tell how many accidents have been investigated by the Board since its creation?

Mr. McCARRAN. I am speaking now from memory. I may be wrong, and, if so, I should want to correct myself. I read a statement that in the neighborhood of 200 accidents had been investigated, as I recall. I may be wrong in regard to the number.

Mr. BARKLEY. Those accidents did not occur on the regular passenger-line airplanes.

Mr. McCARRAN. No.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Air Safety Board investigate every accident, even an accident which occurs to some private blimp, or to a little airplane with one engine operated by a citizen simply for his pleasure?

Mr. McCARRAN. The reason for such an investigation is that every blimp and every plane that is flown out of a public field is either a menace to that field or is an agency which must be considered in that field because it flies the same atmosphere with passenger planes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand that, and I am not complaining because they do that; I am merely stating as my understanding that it is their duty to investigate all airplane accidents, whether they occur on regular planes which are common carriers, or whether the accident occurs on a plane which I might operate, or the Senator might operate, if either one of us could operate one, which neither of us can. What have they done specifically, after investigating airplane accidents, to prevent accidents? I might further ask, Has the Air Safety Board itself agreed unanimously in its reports as to the causes of accidents which have been investigated, and the remedies which should be adopted to prevent accidents?

Mr. McCARRAN. I am advised that, for a time, when a certain individual was a member of the Board, there was disagreement. I am advised that following his resignation, and its acceptance by the President and his transfer to another place, there has been absolutely no fundamental disagreement.

Mr. BARKLEY. When was that?

Mr. McCARRAN. I have not the time in mind.

Mr. BARKLEY. There is one other matter about which I should like to have the Senator give us some information if he can. The statement has been made that when an accident has occurred the Air Safety Board would send someone, some member of the Board, to make an investigation, that the Administrator also would go in a plane furnished by the Government and make his investigation, that some member of the Board of five would go, and that from three different directions the accident would be investigated, and separate reports would be made and separate recommendations made with respect to it. Can the Senator enlighten us about that?

Mr. McCARRAN. I know of no such procedure, although such a course could be followed, and in my judgment there would be nothing wrong in it.

Mr. BARKLEY. All of which, if it be true, lends substance to the complaint that there has been dissension among the three separate organizations forming the Aeronautic set-up, a board of five, which I thought we were creating with supreme power to make regulations governing aviation activities; the Administrator, who, I understand, took the position that he really was the chief officer of the whole outfit, and therefore the others were advisory to him; and the Air Safety Board, whose functions are limited to the investigation of accidents, and who are without authority to make regulations for the operation of airplanes, that authority being lodged in the board of five.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, it is largely conjecture on my part, but there may have been a time, there naturally would have been a time, after the set-up was first completed, when men in important places were seeking to determine what their powers and duties were under the law. Any new agency set-up would naturally pass through such a preliminary period. During that time it may have been true—I do not say that it was, because I have nothing to support such a statement—that one, say, for instance, the Administrator, thought that he was the top. It may have been true that someone on the Board thought that he occupied the top place. But those troubles have long since passed out of the picture.

Mr. BARKLEY. As to whether the situation has developed according to the Senator's statement, there still seems to be a question, although I am sure he is sincere in thinking it has.

Mr. McCARRAN. One thing is certain, if I may interrupt the Senator, that through it all, if there were dissensions, as would naturally be the case, the one great vital thing that was sought to be accomplished was accomplished, namely, safety to pilots and the public.

Mr. BARKLEY. I imagined that the efficiency and the training and the alertness of the pilots themselves contributed as much, if not more, to the safety of navigation in the air as anything any board in Washington would do to control the operations of the planes. It may be that the question of the release of a plane from a certain airport when the ceiling is low and clouds are heavy might make a contribution to safety; but, after all, it seems to me that the pilots are entitled to as much credit as is any board for the safe operation of planes in the last year or so.

Mr. McCARRAN. I concede that the pilots of this country are most efficient, but they are here today, Mr. President, very much in evidence, begging to be permitted to continue under the authority which has had control of this industry for a year.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMATHERS in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that all the skill and all the courage and all the self-abnegation of the pilots, which were as great then as they are now, did not protect their lives and the lives of the passengers when they were under a bureau in the Department of Commerce.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, the same statement might be made of automobile operation or railroad operation. All have gone through periods of development. I am not now arguing the merits of the proposal; but I think we make a mistake when we say that the 13 months' operation of passenger planes without an accident is due to the Safety Board, without giving the pilots the credit due them for greater skill and operation, and for greater knowledge of all the factors which enter into the operation of airplanes, credit which it seems to me at least some have been willing to accord them. I accord the greater portion of the credit for this record to the airplane pilots.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the Senator from Nevada will yield further, I certainly would not in any way detract from the great credit due those men who go up in the air day after day with their own lives and the lives of their passengers in their hands, but I put the shoe on the other foot, and I say that before the present set-up was created the lives of a great many people were lost because of bureaucratic failure when this activity was under a bureau of the Department of Commerce, and anyone who will read the record of the testimony before the Copeland committee will come to the same inescapable conclusion.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, that leads to the suggestion, that, as I think, we all realize, it is easy to conjecture that something would have happened if something else had happened which did not, and it is always easy to say that something else would not have happened if something else had happened which did not, which is all complicated speculation. We do not know that there would have been an accident in this country if the Air Safety Board had not been created, and if Congress, instead of having a hydra-headed organization, with three heads, all of them debating which was the real head, had simply created the Aeronautic Authority itself, and given it supreme authority, without having to divide the authority between an Administrator and the Air Safety Board. But I do not care to prolong the discussion, because I hope that before the end of the week we can get back to the silver bill, which has not been discussed for 2 days. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. Mr. President, if the Senator had gone to an airport to take a plane for Louisville or New York before the Civil Aeronautics Authority and the Air Safety Board and the Administrator were provided for, he would probably have found two or three competing lines, at any of the large airports of the country, flying planes to Louisville or New York at approximately the same time. When the weather was doubtful, there was much competition between the lines, and one line would hold its planes waiting to see whether the other lines were going to fly. To give one very flagrant example of chance-taking, if the other lines canceled their flights, one line would pick up their passengers. The pilot might get through. At that time, although the airlines allowed the pilots to exercise a certain amount of discretion, nevertheless they were supposed to earn their money, and were supposed to fly. Then the Air Safety Board was created, whose duty it was to make investigations and recommendations when there were accidents, and to recommend to the Administrator and the Authority what ought to be done.

As a result of the investigations made by the Air Safety Board into the practices which have been cited, and many others, the Civil Aeronautics Authority issued an order to the air lines that when one line canceled a flight because of bad or uncertain weather every other line operating an airplane from the same airport also had to cancel its flights.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LEE. Has the Senator from Nevada yielded the floor?

Mr. McCARRAN. I have yielded the floor.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. I have concluded, anyway.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I should like to make one observation.

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I should like to make an observation regarding what the Senator from Idaho has said about my going to Louisville or New York, as I did numbers of times before the Civil Aeronautics Act was passed. That raises a question whether the Department of Commerce, which has come in for so much criticism—and I am not defending what happened—had the authority to order that either one or both lines should cancel flights, and if it had no such authority, what could they have done about it? I doubt whether they had the authority which we later gave to the Air Safety Board, and if we did not confer such authority upon the Department of Commerce, was it the fault of the Department of Commerce or was it the fault of Congress that we did not give them sufficient authority to do what the Board would naturally do with regard to cancelation of flights?

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. The Senator was arguing that the Air Safety Board had done little to contribute to safety, and I was giving an illustration.

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I was asking as to what they had done.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. That is one thing they have done.

Mr. BARKLEY. That was something the Department had no authority to do until we created the Air Safety Board.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE HORSE TO NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me to make a short statement?

Mr. LEE. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I plan to take but a few minutes of the time of the Senate to speak on a subject of paramount importance concerning our national defense.

I received a letter recently from a good friend and one of the most outstanding and respected citizens of New Mexico, former Lt. Gov. Hiram A. Dow, of Roswell, N. Mex. The theme of Mr. Dow's letter is the importance of the horse in our national defense. Because of the timeliness of the letter, and out of respect for the argument raised by a practical and successful man, who was born and raised in the horse country and knows what he is talking about, I asked and secured permission from its author that the letter might appear in the permanent records of this body.

I send Mr. Dow's letter to the desk and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

HERVEY, DOW, HILL & HINKLE,
Roswell, N. Mex., April 22, 1940.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I desire to address you upon a subject which I consider to be of vital interest to western people in particular and to all people in general.

It seems that a constant effort is being made to do away, almost entirely, with the horse cavalry. I would appreciate it if you would take the time to confer with the present Chief of Cavalry, General Herr. It seems to me that the horse cavalry should be maintained at full strength and augmented by the mechanized units. That the mechanized units should be allowed to recruit its own men outside the cavalry and beyond the regular cavalry strength. At present men to man the motor equipment must be assigned from the regular cavalry forces. Should this continue, the horse cavalry will be completely done away with. General Herr is taking a stand against this.

It takes years to train men as horsemen, and recruits suitable for the mechanized units should be plentiful and can be found in machine shops galore. Of course, you and I know that one who has come to understand and love a horse cannot be surpassed as a fighter. We cannot wonder at the clamor for cavalrymen with which to supply men in all the other units and branches of the Army. We could offer no valid objection if our entire Army personnel should be required to first serve a number of years in the Cavalry. Such service would certainly supply necessary stamina. However, that seems beyond anything we could ever hope for. Nevertheless, I trust that you will put forth every effort and use every means at your command to see to it that the horse Cavalry is not reduced in number of men or animals.

Only recently the adjutant general of New Mexico, acting in collaboration with the National Guard Bureau, has transformed the New Mexico Cavalry regiment into an antiaircraft outfit. I think this a most unfortunate move. The reason for this seems to have been that New Mexico forces would have lost their identity in event of mobilization. I think it rather a lame excuse for a change of such momentous import to our State and to the country. (By the way, the National Guard is becoming quite "cocky" in regard to its "standing" in relation to the Army. The guard is getting good, which is fine and as it should be, but I still believe in Congress giving our standing Army a chance to occupy its proper sphere, and Congress should not let it be relegated to the background even by our efficient and necessary National Guard.)

The Western States, in particular, will experience great economic harm if the horse cavalry is not kept up to its allotted strength, and it is most unfortunate that we have so few people of sufficient vision to realize the great value of horse cavalry in a vast open country like our own. This attitude on the part of some might eventually lead to doing away with one of the finest services the country is now receiving from the United States Government—the Army remount breeding plan. This plan has been a great boon to western stockmen and to the country—to agriculture, if you please. It may be that this "eating away of the Cavalry" is partly the result of lobbyists representing the motor industry. Watch out for that. The present Chief of Cavalry, before the subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee, strongly defended the need for horse cavalry in conjunction with our fighting units. He also made an extended statement as to the need for a larger training area for Cavalry forces—recommended an area in New Mexico and Texas for this very purpose. We have, as you know, the finest Cavalry proving ground in the world. If this Cavalry training area can become an established fact, maybe then we can have in New Mexico a large number of Cavalry units permanent "homed." It will then be easier to augment our National Guard set-up with additional units of Cavalry because of the need of such auxiliary forces to the Regular Army and of the availability of training location.

I feel deeply on this subject and I think it merits your thought and attention, looking to an early correction of a condition that is literally "raising hell" with one of the finest and certainly the most colorful branch of our Army.

You know, Senator, that from the standpoint of what some may call sentiment, there is much that could be said, and, remember, its love of country, fired by deep-seated sentiment, that furnishes our Army its fighting morale, and that also provides purchasers for Liberty bonds, etc. I do not care to see the horse cavalry even diminished by mechanized units, and I am sure that you feel that way about it. Both you and I are given somewhat to this so-called "sentiment." We all know that the rise of civilization began with the domestication of the horse. The pioneering of the Americas by the Conquistadores, described by the illustrous Lummis as "the largest and longest and most marvelous feat of manhood in all history" was accomplished by means of the horse. Nothing could be more patent than the fact that the gradual covering of the earth with man's dominance has its great debt to acknowledge to the animal that made man's travels possible. Throughout the ages the horse has been side by side with man and if the time shall ever come, as some boastingly declare, when the one shall breed away from the other, the puny relic of a once perfect manhood will not live long enough to trace the record of it on the tablet of time.

Far be it from me to attempt to eulogize the horse, for even Aristotle, who enjoyed the privilege of sitting on the top rail of the "big corral" and watching Alexander the Great "uncock" Bucephalus, in a book of a thousand pages, did not say all that could have been said on the subject. Leonardo da Vinci, perhaps the most accomplished, graceful, gracious, efficient, and versatile personality that the world has ever known, made an attempt in that direction. His biographers tell us that Leonardo attributed much of his bubbling perrenial joy in life to his close association with the horse; that he was a horseback rider from boyhood until his 84th year, and that when death, through accident, claimed him, he went out with a smile and wave of the hand, intimating with broken breath that if there were no horses in Paradise, he did not care to go there.

To me the history and record of the horse is as "dazzlingly splendid and as alluringly lovely as the poems of Omar Khayyam." It was centuries ago that the Persians taught their children only "to ride, to shoot, and to tell the truth." I call your attention specifically to the order in which those three virtues are listed. On the subject of the horse one could, it seems to me, write indefinitely, and only at the end of a lifetime feel and say, as Titian did when he lay dying, "Now I am almost ready to begin."

Never did a triumphant warrior live who was not commemorated along with his equally heroic mount. Think of the task of interesting anybody in the biography of Alexander the Great without "Bucephalus"; Napoleon without "Marengo"; Wellington without "Copenhagen"; Washington without "Nelson"; Taylor without "Old Whitney"; Grant without "Cincinnati"; Lee without "Traveler"; Sheridan without "Rienzi"; Stonewall Jackson without "Old Sorrell," or Custer without "Comanche." (Custer's mount was "Dandy," and "Comanche" belonged to Capt. Myles W. Keogh, but "Comanche's" name became inseparable with that of Custer's, "Comanche" being the sole survivor of the Battle of the Little Big Horn.)

We owe to Caroline Ticknor (The Book of Famous Horses) a debt of gratitude for preserving for us various accounts of one of the most famous cavalry horses of all time—"Two-Bits." This horse, the mount of Capt. Charles A. Curtis, originated in New Mexico, around old Fort Craig, on the Rio Grande. Many exploits of master and horse are recounted in Caroline Ticknor's book. "Two-Bits" ended his famed career by braving the Indians and giving his life to carry the mail in safety from Fort Whipple, Ariz., to Santa Fe, N. Mex.

Not so long ago I had the honor of standing beside you at Fort Myer, Va., while we witnessed a colorful exhibition performance of horse-drawn artillery. This drill went on midst the stirring strains of the most thrilling Army song ever written—While the Caissons Go Rolling Along—and it was grand and inspiring. I am wondering if our patriotic emotions would have risen as they did with the band playing against the noisy rumbling of muttering motors.

I hope, Senator, that I have awakened in you a kindred emotion; but, be that as it may, I conclude by expressing the fonder hope that when we join the vast concourse foregathered across the river we will find there the spirit of the horse roaming the broad meadows and drinking from the sweetwater branches; but if for us there be naught but dreamless sleep, may our bones never fail to rattle in ectasy at the roll of phantom hoofbeats.

My sincere regards.

HIRAM M. DOW.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, may I infringe on the time of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. LEE] for a brief moment longer?

Mr. LEE. Yes, indeed.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, it is particularly fitting at this time when the subject of national defense is giving us so much concern, in view of the alarming state of affairs in Europe, that careful attention be given to every branch of the service. Mr. Dow's letter is an exposition on the importance of our mounted Cavalry.

We are at the moment conducting hearings on the Military Establishment bill. We are getting testimony from ranking officers of the Army as to our needs for national defense. Consequently, no effort should be spared to obtain every possible information to guide us so that we may make no mistakes which might jeopardize our national security.

To us in the West the Cavalry seems all important. We are acutely aware of the immensity of our great Nation. I believe we in that section are more familiar with the geographic and topographic nature of the West. Our vast plains, the rough and forbidding badlands, the rocky defiles and tremendous canyons convince us that mounted Cavalry will ever play an important role in their defense; for to strike at the teeming and rich lands and industrial centers of the central and eastern part of the United States from the west, an invader must first go through the West.

We hope and pray that our plains, arroyos, and high mountains may never know the tread of an invader. God forbid that this should ever take place; but if it should, we know that in conjunction with the new arms of the service—the air force and the mechanized units—the Cavalry would play a heroic and important role in the West.

The lesson taught in the recent civil war in Spain, the topography of which is strikingly similar to that of our own Southwest, where General Yague's cavalry won renown in a war of air-bombing and tank attacks, clearly reveals that the horse is still important in modern warfare.

In the West our own history convinces us of this fact beyond argument. It was first conquered and occupied by the Spaniards. The Spanish conquistador said that next to God he owed his success to his horses.

The American occupation of the West was made by men on horseback. Kearney's march to California with the army of occupation was made by Cavalry. Many of our highest ranking officers received their early training in the western campaigns against the Indians. We are told that nowhere in all the wide earth is there a region more suited for horses than the broad expanses of northern Mexico and the western portion of the United States.

Governor Dow, who wrote the letter, comes from the heart of the horse country. He was born and reared on the Chisholm Trail, which, as we all know, is famed in cowboy and western legend. It is a trail that Billy the Kid, Pat Garrett, and Gen. Lew Wallace rode in yesteryear.

The horse is a part and parcel of our history and tradition. We in the West love and respect the horse, and we hope that its historical and strategic importance will not be overlooked in the haste to adopt more modern and attractive implements of war. We need the horse to defend our own terrain.

I thank the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. LEE. The Senator is entirely welcome.

NOMINATIONS OF GRADUATES OF UNITED STATES NAVAL ACADEMY

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. The President of the United States has today sent to the Senate the nominations of the midshipmen who will graduate from the Naval Academy the first week in June. These nominations represent appointments as second lieutenants in the case of the young men who go to the Marine Corps and as ensigns in the case of those who go into the line of the Navy.

In this connection, for the sake of saving the expense of printing, and also to expedite action, I submit, as in executive session, three unanimous-consent requests:

First. That the nominations be considered without reference to the committee.

Second. That the nominations be confirmed.

Third. That the President be notified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GURNEY in the chair). Is there objection to the several unanimous-consent requests of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Kentucky for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum?

Mr. LEE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Davis	Lodge	Sheppard
Ashurst	Donahey	Lucas	Shipstead
Austin	Downey	Lundeen	Slattery
Bailey	Ellender	McCarran	Smathers
Bankhead	Frazier	McKellar	Smith

Chavez	Johnson, Calif.	Reed	White
Clark, Idaho	Johnson, Colo.	Reynolds	Wiley
Clark, Mo.	King	Russell
Connally	La Follette	Schwartz
Danaher	Lee	Schwellenbach

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, I wish to discuss the duties of the Federal Bureau of Investigation with respect to foreign agents in this country.

At the beginning of the present administration crime was rampant in the United States. The activities of kidnapers and racketeers filled the newspapers. One could scarcely pick up a newspaper without reading of a racketeer's gang terrorizing some community; one could scarcely tune in on the radio without hearing of some new kidnaping. Racketeers, with their gangsters and mob violence, ruled in the large cities like czars.

The President took cognizance of the situation, and Attorney General Cummings prepared seven bills, which the Congress subsequently passed, giving more power to the G-men to eliminate crime in this country. Up until that time the advantage had all been on the side of the gangster. The Federal officer had to take all the chances of life; he had to endanger his own life before he could act. All the laws pertaining to the situation seemed to be drawn to help the gangsters. The laws were not so drawn, of course, but the gangsters were smart; they were shrewd; and they took advantage of the legal situation. So Attorney General Cummings prepared the seven bills and asked Congress to act on them. Congress did so, and gave more power to the Federal officers to run down the racketeers and to stop crime in this country.

The names in some of the headlines of that day will recall to us the stories of crime; but when the G-men swung into full action, under the new power granted them by the acts of Congress, they made the name of the Federal agent and the Federal officer poison to the gangster and the criminal. Pretty Boy Floyd, Baby Face Nelson, Dillinger, Machine Gun Kelly, Bates, Bailey, Bruno Hauptmann are only some of the headliners that the Federal agents destroyed, and when they destroyed one of those gangsters they usually broke the backbone of his ring, until today we have a reasonable degree of protection because of the fearlessness of the Federal officers, and because they have carried out the wishes of the people of this country to eliminate the criminal and the gangster. They had to use different methods and different devices, but, finally, when Congress authorized them to use some of the methods of natural defense which they had a right to have on their side, so they would be, at least, on an equal footing with the gangster and the racketeer, they drove crime to cover in this country. Never in the history of the United States has there been such an unmitigated drive on crime as has occurred during the present administration until today the name of the G-man makes the criminal tremble in his hide-out, and the Federal agent has become poison to the gangster and the racketeer.

Mr. President, I do not approve of third-degree methods, and I say that we must all, of course, guard against the infringement of civil liberties to the *n*th degree; but, at the same time, we must guard the general welfare of our country, and we must not, in our efforts on one side, limit the Federal officer too much in his efforts to perform his duty. He may make mistakes; he is only a human being; there is no doubt he has made mistakes; but there is another phase of the G-man's duty and of the duty of the Federal Bureau of Investigation today, and that is to run down the agents of foreign countries who are in the United States.

A nation and a government have different obligations under different circumstances. For instance, when all the world is at peace we can then relax our vigilance perhaps to a greater degree than when danger is threatening from every side. I know, too, it is true that in times of national distress and national danger sometimes we lose sight of the importance of preserving those personal guarantees of civil liberty. That I know is a danger. I believe it was Daniel Webster, or, at least, one of the great statesmen of America, who warned against that when he pointed out that in times of national crises it is necessary sometimes temporarily to surrender those personal liberties, but he also warned that with the coming of security we should hasten to restore those safeguards. That is good advice to us today; but I wish to point out that while the United States is not at war, about two-thirds of the earth is blazing with war today, and, with the modern inventions, with the modern fast means of transportation, with almost simultaneous news flashes on the radio, the wireless, and the telegraph, we are in a different situation than if we were isolated, as was true many years ago. Therefore, while we are not now at war, there are dangers to which we should certainly be alert and which I think might argue a little bit for forgiveness if our Federal officers, in their diligence to trail down foreign agents, occasionally overstep the bounds of civil liberties. I think it is wholesome that their attention be called to it. I think the words spoken yesterday by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] will have a wholesome effect in sounding the danger of transgressing beyond the civil-liberties line; but there are other things, good things, along with what has been said, to which attention should be called in support of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which has been assigned an important task.

Today, with various nations collapsing because they have been undermined by foreign agents, am I an alarmist if I say that vigilance is still the price of liberty? Am I an alarmist if I raise a cautioning hand and say that we should encourage the F. B. I. to smell out and hound down the foreign agents in this country who are doing their best to undermine, honeycomb, and destroy the foundations of our Government? I believe not. I think it is a different situation which we confront today.

I was in Uncle Sam's Army during the war. I realize that the representatives of the F. B. I. perhaps came at an inconvenient hour when they woke, so early in the morning, some of the persons they were to investigate. Perhaps they were disturbed; but while I was in the Army I was aroused that early every morning and was subjected to a number of inconveniences to which I do not have to submit in peacetime, but to which I then submitted perfectly willingly, because a crisis was confronted. A different situation prevailed, and the usual guarantees of personal liberty which exist in peacetimes, when there is no crisis, could not then be enjoyed.

The first night I spent in Camp Cody, N. Mex., I slept on the ground. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] suggests it was good ground. It was. It was soft, sandy ground, and it was warm, because the sun had been shining on it all day. The next morning I reported the fact to the sergeant, and the sergeant looked very serious, and said, "Well, now, that is just too bad. Uncle Sam has been disgraced. You had to sleep on the ground." I caught the spirit of it, and I saw that it was not any disgrace; that we were at war and the situation was a different one, and I continued to sleep on the ground. On several nights after that I would have been glad to have had that bed on the soft, warm sand of New Mexico.

Then the next morning I was routed out seemingly before I had gone to bed. I know it is a little embarrassing for an investigator to require a fellow to strip off his clothes. The military authorities made me strip mine off that morning; they made me strip mine off several times. They cut my hair short, and made me rub kerosene in it. They made me strip naked and turn my clothes over to them, and they put those clothes in a delouser, and they shot steam through them; and they made me get under a shower bath, and about the time I got soap all over me they turned the water off and made me go on out.

It may have been embarrassing for the man in Detroit who was being investigated to have to put on a pair of pants that did not match the suit of clothes he was wearing. In civilian times, as I said a while ago, those are things we want to guard against; but when the Army authorities took away my civilian pants they gave me a pair of pants that would have fitted the guard outside the Senate Chamber, who, I believe, is about 7 feet tall. I had to put them on, and I had to wear them. I did not feel comfortable. I had on a blouse that matched them, but it was too long. I do not remember whether the clothes shrank or whether I grew, or whether I traded them off; but the incident illustrates the fact that I was then in a different situation and I was willing to accept a temporary suspension of rights I would have had under other circumstances, because of the seriousness of the situation.

During the war we suspended the Constitution itself, not once but many times. The Constitution says that involuntary servitude shall not exist in the United States, and yet in every one of the draft resisters' cases the Supreme Court, when it acted upon the case, held that there was a temporary suspension of the rights guaranteed under the Constitution, but the Nation was at war, and a different set of circumstances prevailed.

The soldier was deprived of his right of free speech in the Army. He was deprived of his right to write freely home. His letters were censored. He was deprived of his liberty. No one questioned that. We are not at war today; but the situation surrounding the United States and in the world is of a serious nature, and I think might cause us to forgive what we might not be willing to forgive under some other circumstances.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Accepting the Senator's argument that in time of war certain changes in conditions are necessary, is it not true that there can be no blending of war and peace conditions?

We had our difficulties after the war, when a number of persons were deprived of their liberties, even though war had ceased, merely because a number of prosecuting officers thought there was a blending of war and peace conditions or a gradual change from one to the other. Can we be going up an incline toward that sort of a position when we are not at war?

I will say frankly that I do not know. I have not been able to come to any conclusion about this argument in regard to the F. B. I. and Mr. Hoover, and I do not want my remarks to indicate that I have; but when the Senator argues that during time of peace, merely because there is war at other places in the world, we should begin destroying civil liberties, and bases his argument on the fact that during wartime it is necessary for military purposes to take extraordinary steps, I think the Senator clearly misunderstands the situation.

Mr. LEE. I wish the Senator would not put words in my mouth. I think perhaps the Senator was not in the Chamber when I laid the predicate for what I have said.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I have been here ever since the Senator from Oklahoma began his remarks.

Mr. LEE. I find myself in complete agreement with the Senator from Washington. I think he has used a fine phrase that helps us. There should not be a blending, that is true; and I even went so far as to say that I did not wish what I said to be taken necessarily in condonement of the record pointed out by the Senator from Nebraska. I do say, however, that we cannot say to our Federal officers, "Retrench, now." They have a difficult task, they are dealing with rough people, and they may make mistakes.

In the testimony which I heard yesterday, so far as I noticed, the only instance of rough handling was when a man was pushed down in a chair and another was pushed away from a telephone. Those may have been slight infractions of a man's civil liberty. I do not know. But the offense was not serious, as I see the matter. The agents were trying to run down some Communists. I do not care to split hairs on this matter. I am sure the Senator will not find me in disagreement with him on that subject, but I am laying the predicate here for some things I desire to say.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has just stated that nothing severe was done.

Mr. LEE. I said there was nothing severe in the part of the testimony I heard.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. A man or a woman was pushed away from the telephone. That in and of itself was not very severe. A man was handcuffed. One might say he was not injured, and, after all, the handcuffs were finally taken off. But assuming, as I think we have a right to assume, that a man had a right to call his attorney on the telephone, he would have a right to resist any opposition offered to his talking over the telephone, and when he was pushed away and denied that right, which, after all, I think, is rather an important right in the protection of civil liberty, the reason why there was no trouble was because he submitted to the rule of the officer who prevented him from using the telephone. Does not the Senator think that the credit for avoiding a difficulty in that instance should go to the prisoner, and not to the F. B. I. agent?

Mr. LEE. I would have to agree with the Senator in that respect and I go further and state that I agree with the Senator that a refusal to allow any individual the right of counsel is certainly an infringement of civil liberty, and I do not mean to be put on record as supporting a denial of that right.

Mr. President, I am pointing out something which I think is important. The Senator from Washington says there can be no blending, and I agree with him in that, but I contend that circumstances should make a difference in the degree of our vigilance, and also in the vigor with which our officers press their work, within the limits of the law, certainly so long as we are under civil law. Of course, if we were at war, there would be military law, but the point I am making is that we should not ask at this time for a retrenchment on the part of the F. B. I., but rather there should be an encouragement for them to continue their work in finding the agents of subversive activities, and the agents of foreign governments operating in this country.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator again?

Mr. LEE. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not believe there is any disagreement between the Senator and me.

Mr. LEE. I do not think so.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has just used the expression that instead of criticizing we ought to be encouraging the F. B. I. Does the Senator believe that we should encourage them in their denial of the ordinary rights of people who are charged with an offense but not found guilty?

Mr. LEE. No, indeed, and I think I added the phrase "within the civil law." Certainly we should not encourage them to go beyond that and violate civil liberty. There would be no point in fighting for liberty on one side merely to be surrendering it on the other. I believe that we should encourage the F. B. I. to press with more vigor, within the law, of course, in guarding the rights of citizens. I may say here, too, that our love of liberty, which I hope we will always have, and our love of civil rights, which I hope we will always have, and our reverence for the individual's rights, have been the means through which the agents of foreign countries have operated. They have capitalized on those things. They are capitalizing on them today. They take advantage of us because of those things.

I would not have it different. I merely wish to point out the condition. To have it different would be to argue against that which I believe in most heartily, namely, our civil liberties. But I realize, as I think every student of political science realizes, that when any nation approaches a crisis there must be a temporary surrender of certain liberties in return for increased efficiency on the part of the Government. During the World War it was said that Woodrow Wilson had more power than had the Kaiser of Germany, but immediately when the danger had passed there was a return of all civil liberties; and there must be no invasion of them.

Today in the United States there is a situation which it is difficult for our people to comprehend, for the reason that we have been safe, we might say, for 150 years, and we have the complacent feeling that "it can't happen here."

There are two types of people who are dangerous to a nation. One is the alarmist, who shouts on every occasion, "Wolf, wolf," when there is no wolf; and the other, who is equally dangerous, is the man who would put people to sleep by making fun of anyone who would point to an approaching danger or raise what might be a danger signal.

Delilah was as much an enemy of Samson when she put him to sleep as were the Philistines who pounced upon him when he was asleep. I think it is unpatriotic to say to our people, either by action or word, "Oh, there is nothing to it; there are no foreign agents; there are no Communists; there are no Nazis in this country." I think it would be as bad to take the other side, and become an alarmist to an exaggerated degree, so that the people would become excited beyond any need.

I wish to read two articles which apply here. One is from Santa Barbara, Calif., under an Associated Press headline, dated April 26, as follows:

COMMUNIST TROUBLES ALONG TEXAS-MEXICO BORDER ARE HINTED

SANTA BARBARA, Calif., April 26.—Danger of possible Communist-fostered trouble exists along the Texas-Mexico border and possibly along the California border, Sheriff Chris Fox, of El Paso County, Tex., has warned. Addressing the California State Sheriffs' Association Convention, Fox said a "serious condition" faces the Mexican-border country from Brownsville, Tex., to San Ysidro, Calif.

Fox declared the Mexico Congress group, which he described as a communistic-front organization, has paid organizers who are banding together the Mexican nationals who have resided in the United States for many years.

"I recognize this as a communistic movement of the most vicious kind," said the Texan. "I am uninformed as to whether the movement has extended into California, but I advise you sheriffs to keep your eyes open."

Now I wish to read into the RECORD an article by Leon Pearson, appearing this morning in the Washington Times-Herald under the heading "Unrest Growing in Mexico; Anti-Cardenas Revolt Feared."

On a spring morning like this one, 26 years ago, President Woodrow Wilson was wakened before dawn by William J. Bryan, his Secretary of State. The trouble was not with Europe, but with Mexico. Bryan announced that the German steamship Ypiranga was due to arrive in Vera Cruz that morning bearing 200 machine guns and 15,000,000 rounds of ammunition for General Huerta.

Wilson acted at once. He sent orders to Josephus Daniels, Secretary of the Navy, to "take Vera Cruz at once." Daniels carried out the orders at a cost of 200 Mexican lives. The Mexican port came into United States possession, and 2 months later General Obregon, favored by Wilson, made a triumphal entry into Mexico City.

Joining the Obregon forces was a cavalry unit commanded by a young man named Lazaro Cardenas. Daniels and Cardenas are in Mexico today, the one as United States Ambassador, the other as President of the Republic. And, according to reports which Daniels is sending to Washington, the elements of revolution, subversion, and unrest are stirring again, as they were 26 years ago.

For once, a charge by "red" baiter MARTIN DIES has been received without rebuttal at the executive end of the Avenue. DIES declared that Mexico was being overrun with Nazi and Soviet agents fomenting disorder. State Department officials declined to be quoted, but admitted that DIES, this time, was not scaremongering. Their own reports indicated the same thing.

Outside the State Department, and perfectly willing to be quoted, is Frank P. Lyons, former president of the New Hampshire Manufacturers' Association, who has spent the past 5 years in Mexico. Lyons says:

"Things in Mexico now are leading to revolution with agitation carried on by both Communist and Nazi agents. Cardenas will be obliged to declare a national emergency, set aside the July elections, and restore order with an iron hand.

"There will be a demand for us to put troops in Mexico to assist Cardenas in breaking the revolt. It will be a second Spanish civil war, and our interventionists, if we make it, will be used by the Germans and Russians as an alibi to continue their plunder of the neutral countries of Europe."

BOB REYNOLDS shouted in the Senate on Monday that Mexico, in return for good-neighbor favors, "has kicked us in the pants." Representative DEWEY SHORT, of Missouri, denounced Mexico's expropriation policy as "piracy" and recommended "economic force" by way of reprisal.

Representative THOMAS HENNINGS, of Missouri, delivered a speech in the House last week about the "spoliation of American citizens by the Government of Mexico," and urged passage of his bill to stage a congressional investigation of Mexican foreign policy.

If Germany is sending spies, saboteurs, or agents of subversion to Mexico today, it would be only a parallel to their action in the period of 1914 to 1918, when German agents made Mexico a seat of operations, directed first from Washington, then from the German Legation in Mexico City.

It was from Mexico that the major operations of Lothar Witzke were carried on, the only German spy who was condemned to death in the United States during the World War. The story of this agent of many aliases is told in dramatic and authenticated form by Capt. Henry Landau in his book, The Enemy Within.

Crossing frequently the border between Mexico and the United States, Witzke developed a plan to cause disorder in this country. In cooperation with the I. W. W., he planned, to use his own words, "to carry out a resolution calling for an uprising of the Negroes, strikes, the blowing up of mines, industrial plants, railroads, bridges, and telephone and telegraph systems."

In August 1918, Witzke was arrested and brought to the military headquarters at Fort Sam Houston, Tex., to face a military commission. At the end of these deliberations, he was sentenced to be hanged by the neck until dead.

But he was never hanged. President Wilson, May 1920, commuted his sentence to life imprisonment, and in 1923, as part of the general release of war spies, Wiltzke was set free.

Mr. President, on the first anniversary following the armistice that terminated the World War, at Centralia, Wash., a group of American soldiers who had just returned from France were parading for the home folks. They were marching, proud of the glory they had earned, as they had a right to do. As the parade passed the I. W. W. headquarters three shots rang out, and two American soldiers fell in the streets of their home town, shot by certain anarchists or Communists from the I. W. W. headquarters, all a part of the general disturbances referred to in the article from which I have read to bring America under the domination of communism. To finish that particular story and point to what I am saying, what did the ex-service men's organization of that city, the American Legion do? Did they drag those anarchists and murderers out and hang them, as no doubt they deserved? No. They threw a double guard around that building and around the jail when the prisoners were taken to jail, and they said to the mob and crowd that gathered, thirsting for the blood of the murderers, "No; we have fought for law and order; we have fought for trial by jury, and these men, whether they deserve it or not, shall have a fair trial." That represents my sentiment with respect to civil liberties in this country. But I wish to add, that in a time such as this, when nations are being undermined and overthrown from within, we should renew our vigilance and our diligence in supporting the only organization we now have capable of finding out about the Communists and the Nazis in the United States.

During wartime we have a military intelligence division and a navy intelligence division, which have many employees working all the time; but now, while we have these divisions, they are merely skeletons; they do not have any men in the field at all. They meet once a week in cooperation with the F. B. I. Today the F. B. A.—the Federal Bureau of Investigation—and the men they send out to trail down the foreign agents in this country, is the only organization that stands between us and subversion by agents of foreign governments. I wish to encourage them in their efforts to smell out and hound down such foreign agents in order to make us secure from within as well as from without.

Mr. President, on the 25th day of July 1934 the Government of Austria woke up feeling secure, and the people of Austria went about their business as usual. There had been some little "brown shirt" disturbances, but the people thought nothing of it. The Nazis themselves quieted any uneasiness by saying, "Oh, there is nothing to this; just a bunch of wild-haired Communists," and thus put the people to sleep. One hundred and forty-seven Nazi agents, disguised in different ways, approached and entered the capitol and then barred the doors, and 147 Nazi agents on the inside of the capitol of the nation of Austria overthrew that Government.

At the same time eight Nazis armed with pistols went to the national broadcasting headquarters, took it over, held at bay the police, and, with a gun at his head, forced the announcer to announce to the nation that the Austrian Government, under Dolfuss, had fallen; that Dolfuss has resigned, and Anton Rintelen, who had been Ambassador to Italy, had taken his place as head of the government. In the meantime four or five Nazi agents went into the office of Dolfuss, who was then the head of the Austrian Government, and who was called a strong little man, and shot him. The bullet had gone through his neck and part of his head but did not kill him immediately, so he started running and crying for "help, help." His voice died out in a bubble of blood; he fell in his own capitol, though the capitol was surrounded by his own men. He had a strong army, but his own general was a prisoner with him, and 147 Nazi spies, working on the inside, took control, while the people went about their business and did not know until 5 o'clock that evening that Dolfuss had been killed.

I realize that it is easy for those who would discount reports of today to say, "Oh, somebody has found a bogey man." That is the most destructive and deadly antidote to a man who would flash a signal, because ridicule is deadly; no one likes to be ridiculed; but, in spite of it, some few will flash a signal today.

When we see the things happen and know they happen the prudent man takes cognizance of them. When I see the fig tree put forth her leaves, I know spring has come, and when I see nations fall from within, as a result of a handful of spies, I know it may also happen here.

The Russian Army fighting on the front found that their shells were loaded with paper instead of with lead. The Russian Army then threw down its arms and walked out, undermined from within; and it is reported that when the Communist Party took over Russia they represented less than 10 percent of the people of Russia. Of course, the reason it was easy for the Communists to move in was the unhappy economic condition as a result of the Czarist regime, and so the Communists, with a small underground network of spies, organized and overthrew that Government.

Do you suppose, Mr. President, that the people of Norway, the day before their Government fell, could have been made to realize that the foundations of their Government had been destroyed and that they were in danger? They went to sleep that night peaceful, happy, and ignorant. I am not talking about mythology. I am not talking about the wooden horse of the Trojan days. I am talking about an event in current history which happened less than a month ago, I believe. When they woke up and saw columns of Nazi soldiers marching into their city, can you, Mr. President, imagine their surprise and how helpless they felt? The few soldiers or officers who had not betrayed their country and had no knowledge of its betrayal received messages from superior officers telling them to surrender or to vacate. The sailors on one ship received orders telling them to go ashore and leave their guns on the ship. Can you imagine the helpless feeling that Dolfuss had when he called for his guards and they could not hear him; when he turned to his officers and found he had been betrayed? Can you imagine the feeling the Norwegian people had when they looked to the army and the coast guard to defend them, and the coast-defense cannons they had paid for out of their pockets to defend them were not only not firing against the enemy but were in the hands of the enemy, turned upon their own men, all by a seductive betrayal method of overthrowing the Government?

Hitler has been quoted as saying that he does not follow his generals, because generals want to fight like knights of old and win battles on fields of honor; but he says, "My soldiers will suddenly appear in the streets of their capitals, and no one shall stop them." It happened in Austria. It happened in Norway. Who can say today that it will not happen in Mexico?

What is the most vulnerable point from America's point of view today? Is it the oceans? No. Is our most vulnerable place from the north? I think not. Our most vulnerable position is from the south—the Latin American countries, particularly Mexico. The article which I have just read shows that during the World War the Mexican Government was at least sympathetic with Germany. There were many sympathizers for the Germans in Mexico. Today, according to information I have received, Mexico is overrun with Nazi agents. I talked not long ago to a friend who had just returned from Mexico. He said he saw with his own eyes German officers in command of Mexican troops.

Let me ask, At what point should the Government of the United States concern itself with activities in Mexico? Suppose Nazi and Communist agents who are working hand in glove in the Mexican situation should join one side of a revolution there—and revolutions are not exceptional in Mexico—and then, by virtue of having joined with one side, should find themselves in control of the Mexican Government, as they did in Spain when the Nazis and the Fascists joined hands and overthrew the government then in power. Between 6,000 and 10,000 Communists have been shipped into Mexico. Many of them are following peaceful pursuits as farmers, but many others are very active Communist agents. I do not believe it is an accident that Trotzky is now in Mexico. It does not make sense. Joseph Stalin—whose real name is not Stalin, but he got that name because it is a word that means steel, he is so hard—Joseph Stalin does not exile his political enemies; he liquidates them. I do not believe it is accidental that Trotzky is in Mexico. What should our Government do? Should we proceed, ostrich fashion, and say that there is nothing to fear? I do not think there is anything to be greatly alarmed about, but I certainly think there is enough for us to encourage the F. B. I. to continue its efforts to smell out foreign agents in this country and find out what they are doing, especially since we have no other means of getting information of that kind.

The Dies committee is not a bureau of agents, an intelligence bureau. It is a committee which can only investigate and give publicity to subversive activities in this country. Therefore, the F. B. I. is the only means we have of securing information of the activities of foreign agents in America. I believe the American Government should concern itself with internal activities in Mexico, or any other Latin American country, which affects us. The trouble is in determining at what point we should take action, or what action we should take; but certainly I do not believe we should sit complacently and see the Mexican Government taken into the hands of Nazi and Communist agents to be used as a base right under our nose. We know the Communists and the Nazis are unfriendly to us; and why should we continue appearing not to see what is very obvious?

As was done in the overthrow of Austria by taking over the radio, we already have evidence that the Communists are placing Communist agents in the radio stations, and as radio operators on the merchant marine of the United States.

There are those who say, "Well, the Communist Party is merely another political party"; but is it? I do not believe it is, because a member of the Communist Party is more in the position of a member of some secret order to which he has taken a blood oath that he will surrender his life, if necessary, for its ideals and purposes. Members of the Republican and Democratic Parties do not have the same relation with their party. In the case of the Democratic and Republican Parties and other political parties, they are simply groups or segments of the American people who share a general political belief; but it is different with the Communist Party. Every member of that party is tagged and cataloged and registered; and their "developed" members, as they call them, are developed in the fine art of sabotage and spying and the seductive methods of undermining a government.

Another difference is that in political parties as we conceive them we propose certain changes in the law; but we propose those changes, when we want them, within the four walls of the Constitution. That is, if we desire a change, we propose that it be done by the constitutional method of submitting it to a vote of the people, if it is a constitutional change, or by having it voted upon in Congress; and such changes as the regular political parties may advocate, they advocate in a peaceful and legal manner. What about the Communist Party? The members of the Communist Party are pledged to establish communism at all costs. We already have evidence that right now they are resorting to perjury, to forgery, and do not hesitate to resort to a number of underhand and illegal methods of furthering their cause. In the establishment of the Communist Party as the controlling party of Russia they went much further, and resorted to murder, assassination, and thought it was justified, and taught that it was justified; in fact, they teach their members that it is justified in order to attain their end. Therefore, in my opinion, they are not to be considered in the same category with a regular political party.

The same thing is true of the Nazi agents. I think the test should be whether an individual's first allegiance is to the flag of this country or to the flag of some other country. I do not believe even a defender of the Communists would stand up and say that a regular member of the Communist Party will give his first allegiance to the Stars and Stripes as against the red flag of Russia. I think that is a test wherein they differ.

I believe the Government should show a firm hand in regard to this matter. I believe the time has come for us to redefine the Monroe Doctrine, and make it apply to the "fifth column." I believe we should announce a new interpretation of the Monroe Doctrine, because the modern method of overthrowing a country is not by a frontal military attack. Some say to themselves, in a feeling of smugness and safety, "Why, we are safe here, with a big ocean on each side." In their imagination they may be thinking of the possibility of a foreign country coming over in a great armada of battleships. That would be the last thing a dictator such as Hitler or Stalin or any dictator nation would think about. Modern methods are different. They do not approach in that way.

If we should really make the Monroe Doctrine apply to the infiltration of Nazi agents in other countries in the Western Hemisphere with the purpose of taking control of the governments of such other countries, I think it would be a proper move at this time and would save us trouble later. A firm policy prevents trouble, while a vacillating, yielding policy invites difficulty. We have seen the result of a yielding policy in Europe in the last year, and in the last few months. We saw England yield to Hitler at Munich. We saw her yield again and again with the hope of throwing him some meat and thereby pacifying his hunger; but he only ate the meat and became stronger by virtue of it, increasing his strength by every new acquisition. A yielding policy means more trouble later, whereas a firm policy, in my opinion, prevents trouble.

I can think of no better example than one which happened when Teddy Roosevelt was President. In 1902 a German flotilla placed a military embargo on the Port of Cabello, Venezuela, under the guise of helping Britain. They said that they would remove it whenever Venezuela apologized to England for an imaginary insult to the English flag. Germany was much more interested than was England.

President Theodore Roosevelt sent this word to the German Ambassador, "Tell your Government to remove its flotilla, and tell it we will submit the dispute to arbitration." The German Ambassador, answering for his country, replied that they would hold the port bottled up until the question was settled, but he made no statement and no answer to the effect that they were willing to submit the question to arbitration. The German Ambassador came to see President Theodore Roosevelt, after a number of days had been set in which the matter was to be settled by arbitration. The Ambassador visited awhile pleasantly, and then rose to leave. Teddy Roosevelt said, "Has your Government given an answer as to the time for arbitrating this difficulty?" The Ambassador replied, "No." Then President Teddy Roosevelt said, "A time limit is unnecessary. We will shorten the time 24 hours, and I have already ordered Admiral Dewey to move the United States Fleet down to those waters on maneuvers." In less than 8 hours the German flotilla was under steam. This shows that a firm policy prevents trouble.

Mr. President, I believe such a policy would prevent trouble in the matter we are now considering. I have attended a few of the hearings before the Dies committee. I have been amazed at the brazen attitude of the Communists in this country. They make no effort to conceal their attitude toward us, their disrespect toward patriotic Americans. They look on us as "fall guys," and say as much. They consider us stupid because of our laws which guarantee civil liberties and protect the individual citizen, and, hiding behind those same laws, they are able to further their program. When they are cornered like rats, the first thing they do is to squeal for their rights, rights which, as to others, they would destroy immediately if they had the opportunity. The first thing they shout is "Constitution." When some of the officers acting for the Dies committee entered one of their headquarters here and took some of their papers, their plea was that that was unconstitutional. When asked if they would support the same Constitution, they were very indefinite in their answers.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I hope the able Senator from Oklahoma heard the almost day-long speech delivered on the floor of the Senate yesterday, which, to my way of thinking, illustrates exactly what the Senator is discussing—in other words, a very able Senator advocating every degree of liberality to those who extend no liberality so far as this Government is concerned.

Mr. LEE. I heard portions of that speech, and I thank the Senator from Nevada for his contribution. I cannot take issue with the able Senator from Nebraska in his devotion to civil liberties, but I am caused to wonder how far we should go in protecting those who would overthrow these liberties by the use of the very liberties they would overthrow.

The attitude of the Communists toward the United States Government and its laws is disarming; it is almost defeating. They think we are so stupid in our determination to hold on to our civil liberties that they make fun of us. It is common knowledge that they laugh about how easy it is to extend their program in this country because our laws are so liberal and because we guarantee rights to individuals.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is delivering an able, timely, and patriotic address. I understand his amazement at the attitude we adopt in protecting the civil liberties even of those who try to destroy civil liberty. As we go through life we must remember that the only toleration worth anything is that toleration which tolerates the other man's intolerance.

Pursuing, if the Senator will further permit me, the line of thought suggested by his able speech, it would be a calamity if it were not so tragically ironical, that when a man, who is antisocial, who is a gangster, who has spent, we will assume, a large fortune, and much of his time, in trying to destroy the United States Government, is arrested, the first thing he does is to inquire of his lawyer, "Is there not something in the Constitution that will take care of me? Is there not something in the Constitution and laws of this country under which I may escape and be acquitted?"

The gangster will secure attorneys, as he has a right to do, who are astute, wise, and learned in the way of taking care of the legal rights of the accused, and of this there can be no complaint. In other words, when a man who has spent a fortune and a lifetime trying to subvert our system of government, is arrested, the instrument, the Constitution, which the accused tried to destroy is the very instrument to which he appeals for his deliverance, refuge, and acquittal in his day of trouble. That is one of the ironies of life, and it is also one of the sources of strength of the American Government.

Mr. LEE. I agree with the Senator, and I would not change a jot or tittle of it.

Mr. ASHURST. I know the Senator would not. But we must apply the philosophy of the Stoics. We must in this life, if we are to have civil liberty, give to the gangster, to the antisocial person, all the civil rights and privileges which would be given to the most enlightened, the most opulent, and most respected of our citizens.

So, Mr. President, I do not grow discouraged because on the whole, we are making progress. I see no reason for discouragement, although the note of caution sounded by the able Senator is timely.

I now repeat what I said in an address made a couple of weeks ago. Many years ago—it may have been when the Government was quite young—a great orator in delivering a eulogy upon our form of government said in substance about as follows:

> If all the men who have fallen under American justice, and who have suffered the death penalty for their crimes were resurrected at the foot of the gallows, and were to frame a government for their protection and security, they would formulate and erect the same sort of government as that government under whose justice they fell.

It is not possible to pay a greater tribute to our form of government than to repeat that quotation from that renowned orator.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Arizona. I always sit entranced when he speaks and follow his words of wisdom. I would not change one jot or tittle of our guaranty of civil liberties, although we see them used to protect those who are not entitled to their protection. If we change them, we would be as guilty as the man who would overthrow the Government.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. It is well to remember that about half of what the Communist pretends he believes he does not believe at all. If the Communist believed that any movement to abolish private property would be likely to succeed, he would oppose the movement.

The Communists remind me of an incident that occurred when I was about 8 years of age, or 57 years ago, when the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad was built through Flagstaff, Ariz. I had up to that time seen but one orange. It cost my father a dollar. The news reached the town of Flagstaff that a train with a carload of oranges would pass through the town, and secretly and privately I hoped that that car of oranges might be wrecked, and that out of the general wreck and debacle I might get an orange from the car that was wrecked. So it is with the Communist. He hopes that out of the general debacle and wreck of the Government he may secure some private property without giving any equivalent therefor.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, that is a very good and apt illustration. It may be true that the Communists do not really want what they say they want, but their whole time and energy is devoted to getting it. They may not want what they get when they get it, but then it will be too late. They may not get what they think they are getting. Instead, they may get a dictatorship such as the one in Russia, where a man's life is not worth anything, where the police hold the power of life and death over the citizen, where the firing squad is the order of the day. Of course, that is the thing we are guarding against, and that is the thing the Senator from Nebraska had in mind yesterday, and he wants to guard against our yielding anything which may lead to surrender of our civil liberties and rights. I agree with him in that respect.

Mr. President, we have before us the task of finding the foreign agents who are now in our country. There is no doubt they are here. To what extent we cannot be sure. They want our bomb sights. One of our soldiers was shot in an effort, on the part of certain persons, to obtain military secrets, and the intent was to kill him. That occurred less than a month ago.

We have evidence of espionage and sabotage that has actually occurred. Efforts along those lines will continue to be made. The only Government organization we have that can find and frustrate the efforts of these foreign agents is the F. B. I.; and I say more power to it. It is dealing with shrewd and clever men, who would willingly surrender their lives, as they do, for the ideal they are following. I should like to see Congress back the F. B. I. up in its efforts.

I am now going to tell the Senate what recommendations I would make and which I believe furnish the answer and the solution to the question of the Communist and the Nazi agent.

In the first place—and this is probably the most important—remove the cause that brings on "isms." That cause is poverty, injustice, and maladjustment of economic conditions. In other words, let us strive to bring about a better order. When a man is earning a living for himself and his children, no one can talk communism to him. It is only when he is in distress that communism appeals to him. Communism is like tuberculosis, it strikes only when a victim is in a worn-out condition. Only when men are desperate do they turn to communism or fascism in any numbers or in any degree. So the removal of the cause is the first and most important thing. We are already devoting much energy to it.

Next I would say turn the light on them. When a searchlight is turned on the dark corner the rats that are there will scatter. In most cases about all it is necessary to do with Communists is to expose them. That is what the Dies committee is doing. We should keep the committee as a standing committee to expose such subversive activities. Usually that is all that is necessary. Communists before the Dies committee refused—and I heard them do so time and again—in the most arrogant manner to tell the names of the members of their party. Why should not the Government have the names of members of the party if they claim rights as a political party? Why are not the people entitled to know who are members of their party? It is an undercover organization. They have a groundwork already operating. It is not operating to such an extent that we need to be alarmed about it, but, at least, it is there.

Evidence was brought out that the Communists have in at least eight different colleges in Massachusetts organizations with from 25 to 60 members. They control other organizations that do not have the credit for being Communist—in fact, 90 percent or more of the members are not—but the members that guide the activities of those organizations are Communists. They are called "front" organizations.

Besides turning the light on them, I next recommend that as we write legislation providing employment for people to the best of our ability, we write into the legislation that no Communist, or Nazi, or anyone else whose first allegiance is to some other country may receive money so provided by us in return for his services. Why should the taxpayers of this country who are patriots be asked to pay taxes in order to pay the wages or salary of a Communist whose determined and avowed purpose is to destroy the Government which the taxpayer thinks he is supporting when he pays taxes? I say, let us write into the law an adequate provision. There was such an effort in the so-called "red rider," but it was difficult to administer. It merely required taking an oath. A Communist does not mind taking an oath, telling a lie, forging, or anything else. Therefore it did not affect him, and it was merely offensive to patriotic teachers. I think an appropriate provision can be written into the law.

I read in a newspaper that the N. Y. A. had furnished free 21 clerks and helpers in the New York headquarters office of the American Youth Congress. I am convinced beyond any doubt that the American Youth Congress is Communist dominated, organized for the purpose of furthering communism. I do not believe we should appropriate money and allow any part of it to be used to pay foreign agents to help destroy us and our form of government.

So there are at least three things we can do in a definite way:

First. We can put forth our efforts to bring about a better economic condition and remove the cause of radical "isms."

Second. We can keep turning on the light.

Third. We can prevent public money from going to the agent of any foreign country whose first allegiance is to some other flag.

CIVIL AERONAUTICS AUTHORITY AND AIR SAFETY BOARD

During the delivery of Mr. LEE's speech,

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield that I may take up a subject foreign to what he is discussing, but one which is very important?

Mr. LEE. Is it in the nature of a bill the Senator desires to introduce, or something he wishes to put into the RECORD?

Mr. McCARRAN. I wish to ask unanimous consent, first of all, to have something inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. LEE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, in connection with my remarks of this morning, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the New York Herald Tribune on the proposed transfer of the Civil Aeronautics Authority to the Department of Commerce under the caption "The Fate of the C. A. A."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FATE OF THE C. A. A.

It is apparent that the President's personal assurances that the Civil Aeronautics Authority will retain its complete independence under his new reorganization order has not reassured those gentlemen in the Senate who disapprove of consolidating this independent body under the Department of Commerce. As a matter of fact, not even the statement of the Chairman of the C. A. A., Mr. Robert H. Hinckley, suggests enough assurance on his own part to reassure the doubters. Mr. Hinckley, on emerging from a White House conference, told the press that he looked on the President's plan as "a great step forward." But he added that in his opinion the independence of the C. A. A. was necessary. He went on to explain that under a possible modification of the proposed plan the C. A. A. would be under the Secretary of Commerce, but not subject to his interference. The Department would "keep house" for the C. A. A. but the Secretary would have no authority over the board.

These two propositions seem to be basically contradictory. If the C. A. A. is put under the Department of Commerce and depends on that organization for its funds, and if, in addition, the Department has supervision over the personnel of the C. A. A. and can direct or suppress any of the reports of the Authority, it is obvious that the Authority loses much, if not all, of its independence. The only assurance to the contrary rests on the assertion that the Secretary would not interfere with the Authority's independence.

Just as the original order reflects the New Deal's passion for centralization so this interpretation indicates the preference of these same leaders for reliance on men rather than on laws. On the mere assurance that a Secretary of Commerce would not wish to interfere, they are prepared to deprive an important agency of its independence. All of which prompts the question: Why, if the Department is not to interfere with the independence of the C. A. A., transfer that body from its independent status to the control of the Department of Commerce?

With all due respect to those who favor the President's order, we believe that it is essential that the entire problem be fully discussed, and be discussed as soon as possible. It is one of the bad features of the Reorganization Act that unless Congress disapproves an Executive order affecting reorganization within 60 days of the publication of that order, the change becomes effective. As the order in question was promulgated April 11, Congress has only till June 11 to consider it. At the present moment the President apparently is looking for a face-saving device. Much better have open hearings on his original proposal, with full attention to those who, like the pilots, are the most directly concerned. Mr. Hinckley should be asked to state his views fully in public. So should other members of the Authority and other interested persons. It is not, we insist—President Roosevelt to the contrary notwithstanding—a political issue. Rather is it a question of what would best further the growth and development of civilian aeronautics in this country.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD, newspaper comment on the proposed transfer of the C. A. A. to the Department of Commerce under the caption "Hinckley and the C. A. A."

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HINCKLEY AND THE C. A. A.

Transfer of Assistant Secretary of Commerce J. Monroe Johnson to the Interstate Commerce Commission and the announcement from Hyde Park that Chairman Robert H. Hinckley of the Civil Aeronautics Authority may be designated to fill the vacancy appears to be timed as a diversion in the face of opposition to the President's reorganization order which would shift the C. A. A. into the Commerce Department.

When analyzed, these proposed moves actually do nothing to guarantee the independence of the C. A. A.

Congress should reject the reorganization order. Opponents of the reorganization plan are being told that the appointment of Mr. Hinckley to the assistant secretaryship will guarantee that the Civil Aeronautics Authority will continue to function under its present leadership and that, obviously, Mr. Hinckley, knowing as he does the problems and aims of the C. A. A., will do nothing to hinder the Authority in its work.

Such an implied guarantee, of course, is worth little. The office of Assistant Secretary of Commerce is a political office. It is filled by political appointment. There is no guarantee that Mr. Hinckley's successors will carry out any policy favorable to the integrity or independence of the C. A. A.

Mr. Hinckley's appointment, to be sure, might insure some protection for the C. A. A. from Commerce Department interference so long as he is in office. But how long will Mr. Hinckley remain in office? The very suggestion of Mr. Hinckley's appointment seems evidence of the fact that the transfer of the authority to the Commerce Department is fraught with danger to the future well-being of the organization which affects the future of American civil aviation. Why, otherwise, would so much be made of the fact that the appointment of a man like Mr. Hinckley to this office will mean that the C. A. A. will be able to continue after the transfer to operate as at present? Must the C. A. A. have a champion on high in the Commerce Department to guarantee its security? If so, it certainly would appear to be a grave mistake to put it under jurisdiction of the Department. For there is no assurance at all that it will continue to have such a champion.

These maneuverings to dispel the doubts and fears of the sincere critics of the C. A. A. change are, in themselves, cause for even more serious doubts than have been raised thus far. Opponents of the transfer should not relax their vigilance for a moment because of the proposal to put Mr. Hinckley in the office of Assistant Secretary, well-intentioned and able though Mr. Hinckley may be. Reorganization Plan No. IV should be stopped by Congress.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a letter over the signature of J. B. Hartranft, Jr., executive secretary of the Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association, under date of May 2.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AIRCRAFT OWNERS AND PILOTS ASSOCIATION,
CHICAGO, May 2, 1940.

Subject: Aviation.

Hon. PAT MCCARRAN,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The executive board of the A. O. P. A. has instructed me to write you asking you to vote against the recent Executive order which, if carried out, would result in converting the present independent and powerful Civil Aeronautics Authority into a mere bureau of the Department of Commerce.

Until 2 years ago the forerunner of the present C. A. A. was a bureau in the Department of Commerce. As such it simply was not heavy enough to handle the job. A bureau apparently cannot command the services of the outstandingly successful executives to head it up, whereas an independent authority can command such services. In any event, the result under the old system was a bureau of insufficient power and ability to handle this strapping young aviation giant that is becoming America's fastest growing industry and greatest new military protection.

Since the C. A. A. was created 2 years ago as aviation's governing body it has performed brilliantly, and the growth of aviation has proceeded brilliantly under it. The C. A. A. has become a body of great power and importance. The honor of being head of this C. A. A., and reporting directly to the President, is sufficient that men of outstanding ability could be drafted. Such an outstandingly successful executive as Mr. E. J. Noble was the first man drafted to head it up. Then men of the caliber of Robert Hinckley and his present associates have felt honored in taking command of this important Authority. It cannot be expected that men of this caliber can be persuaded to head up a mere bureau under the Department of Commerce. The caliber of the men running the Authority determines the quality of the job it does.

We feel that it would simply be a case of bad judgment to wreck this outstandingly successful Authority by demoting it to incompetent management and submitting it to departmental regulations which will hamper it.

The C. A. A. has in 2 busy years had many brilliant successes. For instance, over 10,000 new civilian pilots have recently been trained—not quite finished at this writing—at an efficient cost per hour of instructional flight, and this has been done with the amazing safety record of only 1 death to date. The average death rate in each of the past 3 years for all other private pilot training in the United States has been, respectively, 37, 51, and 74 times that death rate. The A. O. P. A. has followed this C. A. A. training program closely, and this record is attributable to but one thing, namely, brilliant management by the able men heading the C. A. A.

If the C. A. A. is demoted, we are told that it will eventually be put under the same body that handles the railroads. This man-with-an-umbrella form of management—unprogressive, sparkless, visionless—has resulted in small progress in railroading in the past generation, too much regulation, and a country full of insolvent and deadened railroads. Let's keep aviation away from such uninspired domination.

Last year's outstanding safety record of the air lines—no deaths—is in no small measure attributable to excellent cooperation and planning by the C. A. A.

The A. O. P. A. (Aircraft Owners & Pilots Association) is the voice of the nonscheduled pilots of the United States. A. O. P. A. is composed entirely of pilots. We have over 5,000 members. All States are represented in this membership.

Nonscheduled pilots fly more miles, more ships, and more passengers annually than do all the United States air lines combined.

The A. O. P. A. will be very appreciative if you will help us in this vital matter. Senator MCCARRAN is, we understand, leading the fight in the Senate against the demotion of the C. A. A.. Also we understand that a measure will be voted on next Tuesday, May 7.

More detailed arguments as to why the C. A. A. should not be disturbed at this time may be found in an editorial in the May 1 issue of American Aviation and in several other magazines. Aviation bodies are unanimous in supporting A. O. P. A.'s viewpoint in this matter.

Very truly yours,

J. B. HARTRANFT, Jr.,
Executive Secretary.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I desire to have inserted in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce of Kansas City at a meeting held April 25, 1940.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the President's Reorganization Plans No. III and No. IV would abolish the Air Safety Board, an agency which has had a large part in the establishment of the fine safety record of transport aviation in the last year; and

Whereas the said reorganization plans also would transfer the functions of the Civil Aeronautics Authority to a civil aeronautics board under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce; and

Whereas the aviation committee of the Chamber of Commerce of Kansas City believes the best interests of aviation would be served if the Air Safety Board and the Civil Aeronautics Authority continue to function as independent agencies: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the aviation committee calls upon the board of directors of the chamber of commerce to express the opposition of the business community to any disturbance of the independence of the Civil Aeronautics Authority, or to the abolition of the much-needed Air Safety Board, since this committee feels such a reorganization would retard the development of aviation, would place air regulations under a politically controlled division of the Government, and curtail the efficiency with which this independent agency has functioned.

MAY 3, 1940.

Hon. JAMES J. DAVIS,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

Consider President Roosevelt's reorganization proposal affecting civil aviation dangerous to safety and growth of national air transport service. Fear that reorganization as now planned will not only endanger safety but also seriously impair financial credit of responsible enterprises now approximating $25,000,000 annually. Therefore respectfully urge you disapprove Reorganization Plan No. IV.

PHILADELPHIA BOARD OF TRADE,
GEO. L. MARKLAND, JR.,
President.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Oklahoma will yield to me further for a moment, before the able leader on this side leaves the floor, as I know he is about to attend a meeting of a committee which is very important, I desire to state that tomorrow I shall move to discharge the committee having under consideration Executive Order No. 4 and Senate Concurrent Resolution 43.

I wish to say further that if the message regarding this matter comes from the House of Representatives this afternoon, I shall ask that it be held in the Senate so that I may move tomorrow for immediate consideration of the House concurrent resolution. I hope I make myself clear.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I appreciate the frankness of the Senator, and I will state to him and to the Senate that the Select Committee on Government Organization, before which the Senate concurrent resolution is pending, is now in session, and I am compelled to leave the floor to attend its meeting. I am not in a position to state what the committee will do. As the Senator knows, the question of whether there are to be brief hearings by the committee in order to get some information which some of the members of the committee desire is one which has been considered. The committee has taken no action on that. I do not know what action will be taken. That probably will be determined in a few minutes.

The question of the interpretation of the rule under which a concurrent resolution comes from either House to the other may also have some bearing upon what step the Senator from Nevada will take. He can, of course, at any time now move that the Select Committee on Government Organization be discharged from further consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution 43. That cannot be done with respect to the House concurrent resolution. My understanding of the rule is that when the House concurrent resolution comes over it automatically goes to this committee, and that the Senator could not move to discharge the committee from the consideration of that concurrent resolution for 10 days. But I presume it can be held at the desk of the Vice President without any action being taken on it at all until tomorrow.

I would not at this time attempt to pass on how the Chair would rule on a motion to take up that concurrent resolution. It seems to me from an interpretation of the law as it was passed with respect to various reorganizations, that when a concurrent resolution comes from one House to the other it automatically goes to the committee. That may not be the ruling of the Chair, but after examining the law and the rule that is my view about the matter. I do not care to enter upon a discussion of that question at this time. Such a discussion will come up if the Senator makes a motion that the committee be discharged.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I should like to make the suggestion, so as to set some minds at ease for today, that I shall not move to discharge the committee today, nor to proceed with the consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 43 today, but I hope the leader may agree with me that tomorrow at the opening of the session we may proceed with the consideration of the concurrent resolution. If it is necessary for me to move to discharge the committee today, I shall do so, but I do not want to do it in view of certain history with which the Senator is entirely familiar. I think the Senator can have the remainder of the afternoon to consider the matter; but I respectfully give notice now that tomorrow it will be my purpose to move to discharge the committee from further consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution 43, and in the interim, if we may understand——

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator a question. Suppose at the session of the committee this afternoon the committee should decide to have 2-day hearings, say tomorrow and Friday, which would be brief, and which would insure early consideration of the matter—I do not know what the committee would do about that—would the Senator still insist that tomorrow he would move to discharge the committee?

Mr. McCARRAN. I may say in reply that the able Senator knows that the chairman of the Select Committee on Government Organization called me before that committee this morning. I appeared before it, and I was asked whether I would accede to such a request. I stated that it was my purpose to move immediate consideration of the concurrent resolution, and I also stated that 2 days of hearings would probably involve 2 weeks of hearings, because 2 days of hearings would not aid the committee at all. The committee has had from the 11th of last month until the present time in which to hold hearings, save and except for a certain period. I am not unmindful of an arrangement made by the able chairman of the committee and myself. I stated that I was compelled to be away for a time, and I also stated at that time that on my return I might ask for hearings. Then, as soon as I could see the chairman of the select committee, after his return and after my return, I told him that I wanted no hearings, and that I was ready to proceed. That statement was made to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], if I recall rightly, on Friday last. If I am wrong in my memory, I should like to be corrected. The time has now arrived when, in my judgment, action should be taken, and nothing can be gained by having hearings, unless they are held for the purposes of delay.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. McCARRAN. I know the able leader does not want delay. I know the Senator from South Carolina does not want delay. I realize that, in keeping with his general policy, he is always prompt, always active, and always wants immediate action, and I want to proceed along with him now. So tomorrow I think it would be well for us to proceed and dispose of this question, and I shall act accordingly.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I wish to say that there has been no desire on the part of the Select Committee on Government Organization to delay consideration of the concurrent resolution.

Mr. McCARRAN. I agree with that.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Nevada had to leave to go to his home, and, as I understand, before he left there was an understanding that the matter would not be taken up in his absence.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. And would not be taken up until he returned.

Mr. McCARRAN. No; the agreement was that it would not be reported back to the Senate in my absence. I think the Senator from South Carolina will agree with that statement.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; but, at any rate, the Senator returned to the city a week ago today—last Wednesday—and I believe on Friday he notified the Senator from South Carolina that he did not desire hearings, which he had previously suggested he might wish. And that thereupon——

Mr. McCARRAN. That was done as soon as the Senator from South Carolina returned and I returned.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes. The Senator from South Carolina had gone to his home State to attend the funeral of a former Member of the House. Immediately upon his return the Senator from South Carolina called a meeting of the committee for today to consider the matter. The matter of having any hearing at all was suggested by members of the committee themselves for the purpose of seeking some information they did not have.

So far as I am personally concerned, I am willing and ready to vote on this proposition at any time, without hearings. But it is not unnatural for Senators to wish information which they may not possess, and I have no way of knowing what the committee may do in its meeting this afternoon.

The Senator from South Carolina is now present, and I will let him speak on the matter for himself. I will say to him that the question was brought up as I was about to leave for the meeting of the committee. The Senator from Nevada rose to advise the Senate and me that tomorrow he would move to discharge the committee from further consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution 43.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I also said that I expected the message from the House to come over at any moment, and unless there was some understanding with respect to the matter I would move immediate consideration of the matter involved in the message from the House. And that is my policy.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I do not think there would be any difference between the Senator from Nevada and me, because we have had one or two conversations with reference to this matter.

When the President's message came to the Senate, the Senator from Nevada introduced his concurrent resolution and discussed the matter with me, and I told him that the committee would meet within 10 days. We had a very friendly talk about it. The Senator said he might want hearings, but he was not certain of it. He said he was going to leave the city, and that he would not want the committee to meet and act in his absence. I assured him that would not be done.

Mr. McCARRAN. May I correct that statement?

Mr. BYRNES. Yes.

Mr. McCARRAN. I said I did not want the committee to report the concurrent resolution back to the Senate in my absence.

Mr. BYRNES. Yes; the Senator did not want it reported to the Senate in his absence, because, as I understood, he wanted to reserve the question of whether or not he would want hearings.

Mr. McCARRAN. I wanted to be here when the report came in.

Mr. BYRNES. There is no question about that at all. The Senator went away and came back within the time he said he would, which, as I recall, was in 10 days or so. He came back Wednesday of last week. In the meantime I had left for a day and came back on Thursday. The Senator from Nevada discussed the matter with me and stated that he would like to have the committee meet the early part of this week, as I recall his words, and I told him that I would see that it was done, but that I did not want them to name a day because I had some engagements with reference to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and that I would look into it, but that certainly in the early part of the week I would fix a day, and thereafter I fixed this morning as the time for the meeting. There is no difference between us on that point at all.

This morning, when the committee met, three members of the committee stated to me that they believed we should have hearings. I advised the committee of that. I stated to the committee what I have now stated as to my conversations with the Senator from Nevada, and I stated I believed that if the committee had hearings they ought to fix a time limit on them. There was an informal discussion about fixing a time limit; that the hearings should be limited to Thursday and Friday. We then asked the Senator from Nevada to attend the meeting. He thought it unwise to have hearings. He feared that the hearings would be extended, notwithstanding the expressed wish of the committee; that there would be demand made that might carry them on for a longer period, and he felt that he would have to give notice that he would move to discharge the committee.

That is about the status of the matter as I know it to be. The committee was to meet at 2:30. If my statement is not correct in any particular, I should like to have the Senator from Nevada correct me.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, it is correct, except I think perhaps the Senator has overlooked one point. I do not think that anything that was said in my conference with the Senator before my departure could be construed to prevent him and his committee from going on with hearings. In other words, what I wanted crystallized was that the committee would not report the concurrent resolution to the Senate until I returned.

Mr. BYRNES. Yes.

Mr. McCARRAN. I think we will agree on that.

Mr. BYRNES. I must say that the thought had never occurred to me, and under no circumstances would I have considered going along with hearings in the absence of the author of the resolution, because by common courtesy I think the Senator would be entitled to be present. I should invite the Senator to be present. I never considered doing otherwise. In fact, no proposal was made until yesterday afternoon, when three Senators made the proposal to me; but had they made the proposal in the absence of the Senator I should have advised them that I would not proceed without inviting him, so that he could be present if he so desired.

Mr. McCARRAN. No meeting was held yesterday afternoon?

Mr. BYRNES. No; when I was discussing the meeting today and asking Senators to be certain to attend the meeting, they informally advised me what I have advised the Senator today.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. Has the message been received from the House?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message has not been received from the House.

Mr. McNARY. The able Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] has given notice that tomorrow he intends to move to discharge the committee.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct.

Mr. McNARY. I think that is the correct procedure, Mr. President. I have given the matter a little thought. I think the message from the House will remain on the desk, and the procedure will be to discharge the committee from further consideration of the Senate resolution. I believe it is the intention of the Senator to make that motion tomorrow.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct; but I had hoped that in the interim we might have an understanding, because it seems to me that with the message coming over from the House there should be some resistance to its going to a committee over my objection, when, as a matter of fact, we can bring the whole thing up on the floor of the Senate and dispose of it.

Mr. McNARY. I have no doubt that the motion to discharge the Senate committee will immediately bring the matter before the Senate for its consideration.

Of course, we are interested in the final disposition of the unfinished business. I realize that the obtrusion of the concurrent resolution will not displace the unfinished business, except temporarily. May I ask the able Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the majority leader, if it is his intention to proceed tomorrow, Friday, and possibly Saturday, so that we may conclude both these matters?

Mr. BARKLEY. The reorganization resolution is a privileged matter, and would automatically displace the pending business temporarily.

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I had thought we could obtain a vote on the pending bill today. It is now obvious that we cannot. I had hoped that if we should take up the reorganization resolution we might dispose of it tomorrow and Friday and adjourn over until Monday. I had not contemplated a session on Saturday, and had not necessarily desired one on Friday; but we shall have to be governed by the situation. If the pending bill is not finished, and if the motion is made tomorrow to discharge the committee, and the motion is agreed to and the matter comes on the floor, then under the rule there will be 10 hours' debate.

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

Mr. McCARRAN. In that respect, so far as I am concerned, I am entirely content to limit very materially the time for debate.

Mr. BARKLEY. That could be done only by unanimous consent. I suppose it might be possible. At any rate, it seems that we shall be in session at least on Friday.

Mr. McNARY. That is what I wanted to find out.

Mr. President, I assume that there is a possibility of disposing of the resolution if we commence its consideration tomorrow at 12 o'clock and the Senator insists on his motion. If that is done, I hope we may have a session on Friday, because I think at that time we can dispose of the bill now being so ably handled by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND].

Mr. BARKLEY. If 2 days are required to dispose of the reorganization resolution, we cannot obtain a vote on the silver bill until the resolution is disposed of. I do not think the Senator from Delaware would want to have a session on Saturday merely to dispose of the silver bill.

Mr. McNARY. No; but if we are unable to dispose of the motion made by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] we should continue in session through Friday in the hope that we may have a vote on the silver bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; that will be my purpose.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, may I finish my remarks?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. A moment ago I stated that it was my understanding of the rule under which we proceed in reorganization matters that whenever either House passes a concurrent resolution, and it goes to the other House, it automatically goes to the appropriate committee of the other House. Is that a proper interpretation of the rule?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Parliamentarian calls the attention of the Chair to a provision of the act which is not in accordance with the Senator's statement. The Chair will read the provision:

SEC. 27. If, prior to the passage by one House of a resolution of that House with respect to a reorganization plan, such House receives from the other House a resolution with respect to the same plan, then—

(a) If no resolution of the first House with respect to such plan has been referred to committee, no other resolution with respect to the same plan may be reported or (despite the provisions of section 24 (a)) be made the subject of a motion to discharge.

(b) If a resolution of the first House with respect to such plan has been referred to committee—

(1) the procedure with respect to that or other resolutions of such House with respect to such plan which have been referred to committee shall be the same as if no resolution from the other House with respect to such plan had been received; but

(2) on any vote on final passage of a resolution of the first House with respect to such plan the resolution from the other House with respect to such plan shall be automatically substituted for the resolution of the first House.

Mr. BARKLEY. The House which has considered a proposal which has already passed the other House comes to a final vote on its own resolution. Then automatically the resolution of the other House on the same subject must be substituted and a vote had on it. However, with the resolution of the Senate still in the Select Committee on Government Organization, when the House resolution comes over there will be nothing on the calendar of the Senate with respect to the subject. Then what disposition will be made of the House resolution before the Senate committee reports, and before the matter has been taken up for action in the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Parliamentarian advises the Chair that the resolution from the other House will be held on the Vice President's desk. The Senate will then take action on the Senate resolution up to the time of final passage, when the House resolution will be automatically substituted.

Mr. BARKLEY. We can solve the problem when we reach it.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I shall read the law.

Mr. LEE. I decline further to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma declines further to yield.

After the conclusion of Mr. LEE's speech,

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Calloway, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the following concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 60), in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Congress does not favor the Reorganization Plan No. IV transmitted to Congress by the President on April 11, 1940.

PROHIBITION OF FOREIGN-SILVER PURCHASES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 785) to repeal the Silver Purchase Act of 1934, to provide for the sale of silver, and for other purposes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, 6 days have elapsed since debate began on Senate bill 785, to end the buying of foreign silver.

There seems to be no further reason for delay in voting on a bill on which long hearings have been held—a bill which was favorably reported from the Banking and Currency Committee by a 14-to-4 vote, and which has the nonpartisan endorsement of the Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, himself from a silver State; of all the members of the Federal Advisory Council of the Federal Reserve System; of the National Foreign Trade Council, an outstanding organization of exporters; of businessmen of high standing from all parts of the country; of the Nation's press; of national and local business and mining organizations; and even of mining journals which speak for our mining industry. It seems difficult to understand why such a bill should be controversial.

All the bill attempts to do is to stop the waste of American resources and wealth in purchasing from foreigners something which is of no value to our country, and which indeed has dangerous possibilities in the increase of excess reserves of banks. The enactment of the bill would simply terminate this waste and remove this potential danger. I repeat that it is difficult to understand those who now delay the consideration of such a bill or who oppose it.

It has been proposed to amend the bill so that it would be required that foreign nations spend for American agricultural products the money which we pay them for foreign silver which we do not need.

I am a farmer, and have been and am now anxious to assist in any practical way to advance the disposition and price of farm commodities. I think the farmer himself must be amazed at the ingenuity of the Congress in seizing upon every opportunity to put forward the popular phrase "agricultural interest" in order to enlist support for measures of wide and varied character.

I say that the amendment in question would fail in its declared purpose, because most of the silver which we are buying comes from countries which do not want our farm products; in fact, they send farm products to us. More important, however, is the fundamental objection that wasting agricultural products on foreign silver is no whit more advantageous to this country than wasting manufactured products on foreign silver which we do not need.

Let me quote from an editorial in a leading newspaper in one of our silver States, the home State of the author of the pending amendment, the Reno Evening Gazette of May 2, 1940:

> Nor have the farmers of America anything to gain in the long run from subsidizing alien purchases of American farm products. If these alien peoples want our farm products they will buy them. And even if this foreign silver buying should stimulate, for a time, the purchase of American farm products this country cannot forever keep up this stimulation by the unsound method of taking in exchange a commodity which it does not need and which, eventually, will injure its own silver-producing industry.

Since the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] would limit the purchase of foreign silver to transactions involving the equivalent purchase by the foreign-silver sellers of American agricultural products, he is in effect discriminating against American manufactured goods. He is in effect discriminating against American factory workers in favor of farm workers. He is discriminating against American miners of minerals other than silver in favor of farm workers.

But that is only one part of the discrimination. The effect of the amendment of the Senator from Nevada would be to subsidize British and French manufacturers at the expense of American industry, as I shall now show.

As I understand, the Senator from Nevada argues that Great Britain and France, in order to obtain Mexican silver to send to the United States for the purchase of American farm products, will send their manufactured goods into Mexico or other silver-mining countries for sale. If such foreign manufacturing nations are to sell their goods in increased quantities abroad in order to acquire silver to sell to us, it is as plain as plain can be that those British, French, and other manufactured goods will compete in Mexican and other silver-selling countries with our manufactured goods.

In other words, the Senator from Nevada, through his amendment to Senate bill 785, is asking the Congress of the United States to subsidize foreign manufacturers who are in competition with our own manufacturers.

Senate bill 785 is a simple bill. It merely stops the wasteful purchase of foreign silver. It does not in any way affect the permanent law of July 6, 1939, which provides for the acquisition of all domestic newly mined silver at 71 cents an ounce. Producers of domestic silver obviously regard it as a mistake to oppose the bill. Again I quote from the Reno Evening Gazette:

> The Nation and the silver producers of the West have nothing to gain from the purchases of foreign silver, which would be stopped by the Townsend bill. The price of domestic silver is fixed by act of Congress, and the pending Townsend bill does not propose to change it. Not a single domestic producer would be injured by its enactment. Instead, they would be helped by stopping the accumulation of this vast hoard of foreign silver in this country.

Similarly, the publisher of the Mining Journal, of Phoenix, Ariz., has this to say:

> I am inclined to agree with you in your contentions regarding foreign silver. I never have been able to see the value in that program other than being Santa Claus to the rest of the world.
> We of the silver-producing States feel that the foreign silver purchasing program has been harmful to the domestic silver money program, and we would, therefore, be quite willing to see that drawback disposed of.

If we are interested in helping foreign countries, we should do so in some way which is not at the same time detrimental to this country, and in a way which is not obviously such poor business on our part. We should do so in some other way than by purchasing something for which we have no use.

If we wish to contrive further ways to help our farmers, let us do so in some way which is economically sound, and not by a method which any farmer can see is utterly unbusinesslike and unwise. If we wish to help agricultural interests, it would be far better to appropriate the amount which we waste on foreign silver directly for the purchase of surplus farm commodities to be distributed either direct or through the stamp plan to our own people.

When the foreign-silver program was enacted the arguments made for it were quite different from those so strongly being urged nowadays. This is perfectly clear from the material I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 2. The Baltimore Sun, in an editorial on May 3, perfectly characterized the present arguments for foreign-silver buying when it said:

> What the case for the silver purchases now boils down to is the bald assertion that Americans ought to supply money to foreigners to buy American goods.

Mr. President, during these debates a question has been raised as to the supposed desirability of silver certificates as compared with Federal Reserve notes. It was objected that the former involve no interest burden on the American people, whereas it was claimed that Federal Reserve notes do involve an interest burden. I wish to read a letter addressed to me on this subject by Hon. Marriner S. Eccles, Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, on March 10, 1939:

> BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM, > OFFICE OF THE CHAIRMAN,
> Washington, March 10, 1939.
> MY DEAR SENATOR: I acknowledge receipt of your personal letter to me of March 3, in which you quote remarks of Congressman WHITE of Idaho, and ask certain questions.
> Your first question is whether Federal Reserve notes involve the payment of interest on the part of the public using them and to the benefit of the banking system.
> The issuance of Federal Reserve notes as such does not involve interest payment any more than the issuance of any other kind of currency. A person who has a bank deposit can withdraw it in currency and does not have to pay interest; a person who has no deposit and has to borrow must pay interest on his loan, regardless of the kind of currency in which he withdraws the proceeds, or whether he leaves them on deposit and checks against them.
> Your second question is whether the issuance of silver certificates reduces the interest burden on the general public.
> The issuance of silver certificates in payment for silver purchases by the Treasury in no way diminishes the interest burden on the general public. It is true that if the Treasury paid for silver purchased otherwise than by issuing silver certificates it would have to increase the public debt by the amount of these payments, but that is not, I believe, what is meant by the question. There has never been a proposal that the Treasury pay for silver out of general revenues or out of borrowed funds. Aside from this, the issuance of silver certificates has no bearing whatsoever on the interest burden.

Your last question is whether the issuance of silver currency increases the interest earning capacity of the banking system.

There is no connection whatsoever between the issuance of silver and the interest-earning capacity of the banking system. The only connection under present conditions is highly indirect and exactly the opposite of that implied in the question. The issuance of silver certificates adds to excess reserves, and this in turn would tend to reduce interest rates were it not for the fact that they are already at the lowest level on record, and for short-term paper are at the vanishing point.

I hope that these explanations will be of help to you.

Sincerely yours,

M. S. ECCLES.

Hon. JOHN G. TOWNSEND, Jr.,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. President, on this main subject, I ask consent that there be printed in the RECORD at this point the testimony of Dr. Benjamin H. Beckhart, of Columbia University, before the House Coinage Committee on March 17, 1939, as taken from pages 210–212 of Extension of Stabilization Fund and Powers, and so forth—Hearing before the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, House of Representatives, Seventy-sixth Congress, first session, on H. R. 3325.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHWELLENBACH in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The testimony referred to is as follows:

PROFESSOR BECKHART'S STATEMENT ON INTEREST

Dr. BECKHART. From profits incident to devaluation. When the French devalued, first in 1928, they used their gold profits to pay off the debt of the French Government to the Bank of France. That was a conservative use of the profits. Later, when the French devalued again, in 1936 and 1937, the profits were used to build an exchange fund, which became exhausted by reason of the flight of capital from France.

Incidentally, the only country on what may be regarded as a genuine gold standard is Belgium. If Belgium can have free gold convertibility, with her relatively small stock of gold, then this country, with our enormous stocks of gold, should be able to introduce gold coinage and gold convertibility.

May I state by way of summarizing my recommendations that, in my opinion, the President's powers relative to changing the weight of the dollar should be allowed to lapse and the life of the stabilization fund should be ended. The profits of gold devaluation allocated to the fund and not utilized should be employed to build up a 100-percent gold reserve against the greenbacks and the silver certificates. The Thomas amendment and the Silver Purchase Act should be repealed. Gold coinage and gold convertibility in terms of the present dollar should be reintroduced and a free gold market should be reestablished. These proposals would have the desirable effect of ending the central banking activities of the Treasury Department. In my opinion this should be done and those central banking activities should be lodged, where they belong, with the Federal Reserve banks.

In the discussions that have taken place before this committee the proponents of silver purchases have advanced two arguments: (1) that silver certificates are issued free of interest cost to the community and hence are superior to Federal Reserve notes, which allegedly are issued at an interest cost to the community; (2) that silver certificates redeemable in a stated dollar's worth of silver are superior to Federal Reserve notes, which, for domestic purposes, are not being redeemed in gold.

Neither argument, in my opinion, has any substance or validity. As regards the first point, it should be borne in mind that all currency in circulation comes into the channels of business through the Federal Reserve banks. If additional currency is required to meet the Nation's needs, this demand is transmitted to the Federal Reserve banks through a member bank. If a member bank has excess reserves, which is practically universally the case now, it does not have to borrow from its Federal Reserve bank to obtain currency. It would not have to borrow whether it withdrew Federal Reserve notes or silver certificates. On the other hand, if it had no excess reserves, it would have to borrow whether it obtained Federal Reserve notes on silver certificates. The fact that member-bank borrowings now total only $3,000,000 indicates the almost infinitesimal amount of borrowings relative to total currency issues. Insofar, then, as member banks do or do not have to borrow from the Federal Reserve banks to obtain currency needed, silver certificates and Federal Reserve notes and, it might be added, greenbacks, are on a par. Notwithstanding this, Federal Reserve notes are vastly superior as a currency to silver certificates and greenbacks in that they are contractible, whereas the others are not. Federal Reserve notes are elastic, rising and falling with trade and business needs, whereas silver certificates and greenbacks fluctuate in but one direction, always increasing and possessing what has been termed chewing-gum elasticity, rather than rubber-band elasticity.

The second argument is that silver certificates are "secured" by and redeemed in silver, which allegedly makes them a better currency than Federal Reserve notes that are not being redeemed in gold for domestic purposes. The point is that anybody redeeming a silver certificate now would lose heavily. A $5 certificate would be redeemed in silver, the market value of which and the Treasury buying price of which is $1.70. No one would redeem his certificate to obtain silver which has a market price so far below the purchasing power of the certificate itself. In the market one may purchase $5 worth of tin, copper, rubber, and other commodities with his $5 certificate. He may purchase just as much with his Federal Reserve note, inasmuch as all forms of paper money have the full legal tender power and are interchangeable. The only time that the holder of a silver certificate would desire to redeem his certificate in silver is at a time when the market value of silver should rise above the monetary value. If this were to occur, doubtless the redemption would cease.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, in these debates we have also heard a good deal concerning the supposed calamitous effects on Mexico if we should stop buying foreign silver. An Associated Press dispatch from Mexico City on March 26, 1940, stated:

A responsible government banking executive asserted yesterday that measures adopted to meet February's "severe currency crisis" had proved so efficacious that for the present the Government felt no concern at the prospect of the United States suspending purchases of Mexican silver. * * *

Asserting that Mexico's internal economy would not be vitally affected by the silver suspension, he declared it was more important that public confidence apparently was behind the peso and that machinery had been created to handle any probable strain that might develop should public fears of the peso's stability reassert themselves.

Mr. President, I ask consent that the full text of the Associated Press dispatch from which I have just read be inserted in the RECORD at this point, and for this purpose I send to the desk a clipping from the Washington Star, Washington, D. C., of March 26, 1940.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the dispatch was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star of March 26, 1940]

MEXICAN GOVERNMENT READY IF UNITED STATES ENDS SILVER PURCHASES—FINANCES STRENGTHENED BY MEASURES TO MEET CURRENCY CRISIS

MEXICO CITY, March 26.—A responsible Government banking executive asserted yesterday that measures adopted to meet February's "severe currency crisis" had proved so efficacious that for the present the Government felt no concern at the prospect of the United States suspending purchases of Mexican silver.

The executive also disclosed for the first time the extent of the crisis when the peso broke more than 100 points in terms of the dollar—from a value of about 20 cents to less than 17 cents.

The Bank of Mexico, central Government bank, and the Republic's most important private banks formed a loose consortium at that time to stabilize the currency around 6 pesos to $1.

Shortly after the Bank of Mexico suspended dealings in the dollar because of pressure on the peso stemming from reports of unsatisfactory economic conditions in the petroleum industry and probable cessation of United States silver buying, the stability of the financial structure was threatened.

FOURTH OF LIQUID ASSETS

Within 2 weeks, he said, 35,000,000 pesos in bank deposits were withdrawn, presumably to buy dollars.

This was roughly one-fourth of the liquid assets of the Republic's banks, because of total deposits of approximately 350,000,000 pesos only 135,000,000 were in such liquid state they could be used to meet depositors' demands.

Confronted with this situation, the banks got together to bolster the currency. They ended loans for luxury imports, such as automobiles. They ended loans for speculative activity.

Officials announced only a few days ago that 17,000,000 pesos had been withdrawn from circulation, helping to give the peso a scarcity value.

DEPOSITS AT NEW HIGH

The executive said deposits now have reached a new high, the peso is holding firmly in the neighborhood of 5.98 to the dollar, and the relaxation of various controls has disclosed no rush toward the dollar.

He declared it was significant that definite reports from Washington indicating the foreign silver purchase policy was threatened with extinction had failed to shake the peso.

Asserting that Mexico's internal economy would not be vitally affected by the silver suspension, he declared it was more important that public confidence apparently was behind the peso and that machinery had been created to handle any probable strain that might develop should public fears of the peso's stability reassert themselves.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the Banco Nacional de Mexico, S. A., in its March 31, 1940, Bulletin No. 172, discusses the question of American silver purchases in Mexico. This bulletin states that local Mexican miners—

> Consider it best to look for a fundamental and definite solution rather than go on trusting in the good will of one single buyer whose political reasons to buy may some time cease to exist, thus exposing us to a temporary but important collapse in our national economy. Nothing would be better, the miners think, than to make up our minds to let silver recover in the international market the situation naturally provided by the reciprocal intensity of demand and supply. In the meantime, we should of course endeavor to increase the production of other metals, insufficiently exploited for technical reasons which it is possible and imperative to overcome.

Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks an editorial from the Washington Evening Star of today, Wednesday, May 8, entitled "Foreign Silver."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FOREIGN SILVER

Some of the debate in the Senate on the Townsend bill to end Government buying of foreign silver has avoided the basic issue, which is: Shall the United States continue to buy, at inflated prices, huge stocks of foreign silver that can serve no useful purpose to us now or later, in order to provide the purchasers with good American dollars with which to buy our exports? In other words, should this Government continue to subsidize our export trade through the medium of a "silver brick" scheme which is filling the West Point repository with a great hoard of pretty metal of declining value? Those who argue in favor of the buying program picture the drastic effect on our export business of an abrupt termination of the silver acquisitions. But the proponents overlook the facts that the buying has been going on steadily since passage of the Silver Act in 1934, that more than 2,000,000,000 ounces of foreign silver have piled up during that period, that the act directs that the buying must not stop until the silver stocks amount to one-fourth of the monetary value of the silver and gold hoards combined, that this ratio is as far from attainment now, due to gold purchases, as it was in 1934 and that this absurd pyramiding process cannot go on forever. The subsidy might as well end now as later—for the economic effects of cessation are likely to increase in seriousness as the world's silver market declines and Uncle Sam's stimulants are little more than shots in the arm.

It should not be forgotten, moreover, that the principal beneficiary of our silver policy today is Mexico, whose government has just rejected our proposals for an impartial arbitration of the expropriation "grab." Adoption of the Townsend bill might help to bring Mexico to her senses. At any rate, there no longer is any basis for the argument made in previous years that repeal of the foreign silver purchase provision might offend friendly nations. China and Canada would not be affected. The Star hopes that the Senate quickly will pass the Townsend bill and that the House will complete the job of repealing the ill-advised foreign silver purchase clause.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have prepared a memorandum on the cost of the foreign-silver program and the cost of the legislative branch of the Federal Government.

Based on figures in the bulletin of the Treasury Department for April 1940, page 56, the cost of acquisition by the Treasury of silver other than newly mined domestic silver has been $1,015,500,000. According to the Budget of the United States Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, page xxi, the cost of running Congress in the next fiscal year is $23,045,700. It follows that the money spent for silver other than newly mined domestic silver would pay the expense of the Congress for more than 44 years.

Last June, when the Senate voted to discontinue buying foreign silver, the Treasury was paying 43 cents an ounce for it. Immediately the market sagged, and the Treasury did not step in to stop the decline until silver was selling on the world markets at 35 cents an ounce. Since that time every ounce of silver purchased by the Treasury or by private consumers of the United States or elsewhere has been acquired at a cost of 8 cents an ounce less than was the case prior to the Senate vote.

With reference only to the acquisitions of foreign silver by the Treasury of the United States since last June, this saving of 8 cents an ounce has amounted to approximately $12,752,000. Since, as I have shown, the cost of running Congress is $23,045,700 a year, what the Treasury alone has saved—$12,752,000—has been enough to pay the expenses of Congress from July 1, 1939, through the middle of January 1940. In citing the expense of running Congress in this memorandum it is assumed that the annual expenses are prorated throughout the year.

With reference only to the acquisitions of the Treasury of the United States since last June, this saving of 8 cents an ounce has amounted to approximately $12,752,000, which would pay the salaries of the delegation from Delaware for 425 years.

FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I wish to compliment the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. LEE] on his very illuminating address this afternoon. I wish that all Americans could have heard it.

Mr. President, I listened with a great deal of attention to the distinguished senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] when he recently presented the case against the Federal Bureau of Investigation and Director J. Edgar Hoover. If the case had been presented by a less unimpeachable source, I question whether it would have merited a rebuttal. However, in view of the high standing and known integrity of the distinguished Senator and because of his long years of unselfish service, his comments have, in public opinion, a validity which makes it desirable that they should be further analyzed.

Mr. President, if you were to ask the best minds in the country today what is the greatest issue before this Nation, they would probably say that the greatest single problem which confronts America is the problem of keeping the United States free from those evil forces which have engulfed Europe. It follows that to keep this country safe we must be adequately prepared to repel both foreign and domestic enemies.

We know from a study of current history that other countries thought they were safe, and we know also that their very apathy made it possible for them to be easily undermined.

In today's issue of the Washington Post there is a column written by Dorothy Thompson, who is now in Europe, showing the Nazi infiltration of the Balkans. I believe anyone who will read that column will feel that it describes a political disease that is affecting the world.

I do not believe I am an alarmist, but I am a man who has lived much, and I was educated in the "university of hard knocks," which, for me, included 30 years of practice in the courts of this land and 6 years as a prosecuting attorney. Possibly because of this background, when my country is in jeopardy, like many other Americans, I am not going to be swayed from my responsibility when an agency designed to save her from enemies within is accused of un-American tactics, and the only evidence which is presented to substantiate the accusation is that the officials who made the arrest of alleged violators of law in Detroit in another case were exceedingly rough in handling the situation. In the Detroit case the men were arrested on warrants issued by a Federal court. I may say that in my practice I have personally successfully sued for false imprisonment sheriffs of counties who acted under warrants. Anyone who is abused or injured has a right, if his civil liberties have been invaded or taken from him, to receive redress from the courts.

Mr. President, almost all the discussion of this subject has concerned itself with alleged violation of so-called civil rights. The Senator from Oklahoma this afternoon very fittingly and clearly discussed the subject of American civil rights. With practically all he said, I can agree. The concern of the distinguished Senator from Nebraska for the preservation of civil rights is not unique, nor does such a cause require any particular defense or flag waving. I believe we are all in accord as to the desirability of vigilantly safeguarding those rights and privileges which have been guaranteed to us under our Constitution and our form of government. I realize that the comments of the distinguished senior Senator from Nebraska emanated from a wholly commendable concern with these rights. I subscribe to a searching examination of every agency of government which might conceivably be guilty of a violation of those rights. We cannot have demagoguery in government any more than we can have demagoguery in attacks on the recognized agencies of government.

It is one thing to accept the impartial findings of the Attorney General "in faith and confidence," and another to discredit those findings as a mere "whitewash." It is one thing to read into the record the statements of defendants and another to read into the record along with those statements the statements of the accused agents. No such record is before the Senate.

Mr. President, apparently one of the principal accusations against the Director of the F. B. I. is his use of publicity. This use needs no defense. It needs no praise. It needs no condemnation. But, Mr. President, it is difficult to determine why it should be subject to such a scathing denunciation when it is no more extensive than are the publicity activities of almost every other agency of Government and not within a thousand miles of the publicity emanating from the White House.

Moreover, there is a very good reason for publicity for the F. B. I. By the very nature of its work it commands interest in boldfaced headlines all over the land. This agency of government is dealing with matters of vital public interest. It is one of the few governmental agencies which has no publicity department, no public-relations director, no machinery for publicity. Its only publicity agent has been the great American newspaper, and I am happy to say that the American newspaper has accomplished for the F. B. I. a very constructive job; aye, more, before I conclude my remarks, I will show that it has done a great work for our country.

It has arrested a great tide of public opinion. It has torn the mantle of sham from the era of glorified gangsterdom, when spectacular gangster funerals compelled the admiration of every boy in the land. It has shifted an unhealthy adulation of the widely ballyhooed gangster to the picture of gangsterdom's nemesis—the G-man. The boys who yesterday were playing at being gangsters today are concerned with the wholesome objective of playing G-men.

Mr. President, let us briefly discuss the question of constitutional rights and their alleged violation. If there have been such violations, it is worthy of speculation that no victim has ever found redress in any court of the land. I wish I could say that to everyone who heard the voice of the distinguished Senator from Nebraska. If these persons have been wronged, the courts of the land are open to them. If they have been arrested without justification, or assaulted or attacked, they have a right to go to the courts. I personally have sued officials of States and sheriffs for violations of rights, even though in one instance they had a warrant, as the officers had in this case. If there have been such violations of constitutional rights, it is interesting to note that the chief law officer of the United States is on record as saying that the F. B. I. has not violated any of our traditional American civil liberties. The Civil Liberties Section of the United States Department of Justice says they have not been violated. The United States district attorney in Detroit says they have not been violated. These are men who have intimate knowledge of both sides of the case.

I know that on the other side we have a number of affidavits presented here, but there seems to be nothing but affidavits. No steps have been taken by the affiants before a court to attempt to obtain redress for violation of their rights.

Mr. President, in an effort to keep the record straight, let us analyze just what the F. B. I. procedure is. Let us consider briefly its legal status, its power to serve warrants and subpenas, its powers to make seizures under warrant for violation of United States laws, and its power to make arrests without a warrant for felonies which are cognizable under the laws of the United States. Let us briefly consider the cases concerned with arrest and search; the cases indicating the constitutional rights of a defendant.

Mr. President, at this time I ask to have incorporated in the RECORD the information to which I have referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MILLER in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

F. B. I. PROCEDURE

The Federal Bureau of Investigation is an investigative agency and functions under the Attorney General in the United States Department of Justice. It is charged with the responsibility of the detection and apprehension of violators of Federal crimes and such other matters as are assigned to it by law. The F. B. I. does not initiate criminal procedures. It investigates the facts which are presented to the United States attorneys who in turn must pass upon the desirability of initiating prosecutive action. Copies of investigative reports of special agents are sent not only to the United States attorneys in the various Federal judicial districts but are sent to the appropriate Assistant Attorneys General in the United States Department of Justice. In matters of unusual importance involving public expediency and matters of grave public importance, I am advised that before investigative inquiry is inaugurated the facts are presented to the Attorney General of the United States, or one of his assistants, for advice as to whether the investigation will be inaugurated.

The Congress of the United States in an act approved on June 18, 1934 (sec. 300A, title 5, U. S. C.), gave the officials of the Federal Bureau of Investigation the power to serve warrants and subpenas issued under the authority of the United States to make seizures under warrant for violations of the laws of the United States, to make arrests without warrant for felonies which have been committed and which are cognizable under the laws of the United States. This statutory enactment has been regarded as giving the Federal Bureau of Investigation emergency powers to exercise in the public interests when it is necessary to apprehend fugitives or when individuals are being sought under Federal indictments whose arrest is necessitated by the time element. The arrests which special agents of the F. B. I. make are made only after the appropriate prosecuting official has passed upon the facts and then only after a warrant of arrest has been issued except in such instances as when the time element will not permit the issuance of a warrant and the arrest is made in order to prevent the wanted person's fleeing.

It has long been the established law of the land that in making a lawful arrest a search of the person arrested and a search of the place where the arrest is made in order to find and seize things connected with the crime as its fruits or as the means by which it was committed, as well as weapons and other things to effect an escape from custody does not in any way violate the constitutional rights of the accused (Agnello v. United States, 269 U. S. 20; Marron v. United States, 275 U. S. 192). The constitutional rights of no defendant is violated when, after a warning, he refuses to admit officers to serve lawful warrants of arrest. This is the established law since the early days of common law and has been continuously and still remains the rule, that provides that a law-enforcement officer who has been given a warrant of arrest to serve may break the door or window of a house in which such individuals live in order to consummate the arrest if the officer first makes a request for admittance, identifying himself and the object of his arrest. Thus, it would not appear that special agents have in any way violated the constitutional rights of any defendants in any case when they served a warrant issued by the Federal district court and, after identifying themselves, found it necessary to gain entry to the home of the individuals wanted by forcing an entrance.

The constitutional rights of a defendant to the right of counsel is provided by the sixth amendment of the Constitution in these words: "And to have the assistance of counsel for his defense." Surely the constitutional rights of a defendant are not violated when he is permitted to confer with counsel prior to arraignment and prior to his actual trial. Special agents of the F. B. I., once a person accused of having committed a crime is arraigned, have no further contact with the accused, since he is remanded to the custody of the United States marshal. Neither do special agents of the F. B. I. have anything to do with the matter of setting bail, since this is purely a judicial function.

As Attorney General Jackson said in his letter which was recently made public and published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for May 7, 1940, "wide discretion must be left to officers in the field. They must act in the face of opposition and perhaps danger, and without opportunity for calm deliberation." That special agents of the F. B. I. have acted properly in protecting the constitutional rights of defendants is attested by the fact that during the past 12 years in over 52,000 convictions resulting in cases investigated by the F. B. I. there has not been a single reversal in a court of appeals based upon the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment to the defendants or so-called third-degree tactics. These facts speak louder than words as to the character of the men of the F. B. I., all of whom must be either graduate lawyers or accountants. Coupled with this was the resolution adopted by the United States Attorneys' Conference which recently assembled in Washington, wherein the prosecuting officials of the Department of Justice specifically lauded the F. B. I. for the protection of the civil rights of individuals.

Once taken into custody, the accused in cases investigated by the F. B. I. are given a physical examination. There could be no greater safeguard against third degree than this one practice, since the special agents must know that they are responsible and must later answer in court for any injury afforded the accused while in their custody.

In the Detroit cases the Attorney General in his report states: "Because of departmental instructions for a speedy trial, the district attorney felt that the possibility of fugitives should be strictly guarded against. This seemed especially desirable since a grand-jury witness who claimed to know the defendants well has stated that in his opinion the defendants, if made aware of the indictment in advance of their arrest, some of them would go to Mexico, where he said a number of former members of the Loyalists were then resident." The Attorney General's report then found that there was no fault to be found in connection with the arrest of the defendants in that case at 5 a. m. in the morning. The real test should be, Did the special agents act within the law, and were the constitutional rights of the defendants protected? The answer seems to be clear. They were warned of their constitutional rights. They did not have to talk unless they wanted to. They were afforded the safeguard of a physical examination, and they were given the opportunity of conferring with counsel prior to the arraignment.

The handcuffing of accused following arrest is a matter that must rest with the sound discretion of the arresting officers. If there is any doubt whatsoever as to the safety of either the accused or the arresting officers, then that doubt must be resolved in favor of exercising the precautionary measure of handcuffing persons, since the officers are charged with the responsibility of delivering them before the appropriate courts for arraignment.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I now desire to call the attention of the Senate to an editorial appearing in the Washington Post of May 7, 1940, entitled "The F. B. I. Absolved." I ask that it be incorporated in my remarks in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Washington Post of May 7, 1940]

THE F. B. I. ABSOLVED

The preservation of our civil liberties depends not only upon impartial enforcement of the laws but also upon law-abiding conduct on the part of enforcement agencies. Hence Attorney General Jackson very properly decided to investigate Senator NORRIS' charges that F. B. I. agents had mistreated persons arrested in Detroit for encouraging enlistment in the Spanish Loyalist Army.

It is reassuring to learn from the head of the civil liberties unit of the Department of Justice, who conducted the probe, that the agents in Detroit "acted within their instructions and exercised their discretion in good faith."

The cry of "third degree" methods is raised so often that the public is inclined to become skeptical or indifferent to such charges. In this instance skepticism was well-founded. But it is a wise precaution to make an occasional independent inquiry into the methods employed in the handling of prisoners. The mere knowledge that such investigations may be ordered has a salutary restraining effect upon the agents of the law.

In the present case the investigator has certain criticisms to make about the handling of large groups of prisoners by deputy marshals. His comments are no reflection upon the conduct of these officers but merely upon the customary practice of handcuffing and chaining prisoners together.

It would not be at all surprising if, in their zeal for apprehending criminals who are a deadly menace to society, some agents of the F. B. I. should occasionally forget the rights which suspects enjoy under our form of government. Attorney General Jackson's confidence that our traditional civil liberties are not in the least endangered by the F. B. I. will do much to dispel doubts on that score and prevent the bringing of baseless charges of third-degree methods.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, there has been much idle talk of an Ogpu. No one wants to see the creation of anything remotely resembling such an organization. It seems fair to observe, however, that an Ogpu or an American Gestapo is unlikely while we can maintain a free and independent government responsible only to the people. It seems as though we are setting up a straw bogey man when we fear such an immediate possibility. It seems unlikely that an F. B. I. of 920 agents could constitute such a threat to American freedom; and if it should for one moment appear that such a thing were possible, the Senate and House of Representatives could refuse to vote any money to keep this organization alive, and thus it would go out of existence.

Attorney General Robert H. Jackson himself on March 30, 1940, said:

During the last fiscal year the investigations by the Federal Bureau of Investigation touched the activities of approximately 60,000 individuals. This means that the Federal Bureau of Investigation had under scrutiny during a year approximately four ten-thousandths of 1 percent of the total population of the United States. Considerably over 99.99 percent were not touched by any investigative activities of the Bureau. They were affected only by being protected from those engaged in or suspected of serious Federal crime.

Mr. President, ours is still a government of checks and balances. The Federal Bureau of Investigation still has to report each year to the Attorney General. The Federal Bureau of Investigation still has to present its budget each year to the Bureau of the Budget. The Federal Bureau of Investigation still has to have its work reviewed each year by the President, by the House Appropriations Committee, by the House itself, by the Senate Appropriations Committee, and by the Senate itself. There appears to be a great sufficiency of checks on this arm of the Government.

Mr. President, if we are to be so concerned with questionable violations of civil liberties, it might be well for us to direct our attention to possible violations of civil liberties in other Government bureaus.

There is no need for further discussion of the F. B. I. Their record is the best answer to any such smoke screen of baseless allegations and abuse; and I do not include in this category the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS.]

I think, as the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. LEE] said today, his bringing this matter out into the open is a good thing. It calls the attention of the people of the country, first, to the fact that we have this organization and that it is doing a great work. Secondly, it calls the attention of the people to the fact, to which the people should have their attention directed, that this country is being infiltrated by a "fifth column" and that the only agency we have to meet those subversive influences, those termites, is the F. B. I.

It should be sufficient for us to know that the F. B. I. is a stanch protector of civil rights. It was the F. B. I. that stamped out the racketeer; that made it possible for our youngsters, our babies, to walk the streets and go to school without being kidnaped. It was the F. B. I. that joined with the police forces of the Nation and made a coordinated working unit to protect and make possible our enjoyment of our civil rights. It should be sufficient for us to know that the F. B. I. stands as a bulwark against a tidal wave of foreign "isms" beating away at our traditional American concepts.

THREE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF ESTABLISHMENT OF GREENWICH, CONN.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of House bill 7806, Calendar No. 1559.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, what is the bill? Let it be read by title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the title of the bill for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H. R. 7806) to authorize the striking of an appropriate medal in commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of the establishment of Greenwich, Conn., as a town.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of the establishment of Greenwich, Conn., as a town, and the granting of a charter for such establishment, there shall be struck at a mint of the United States to be designated by the Director of the Mint 50,000 commemorative medals of a special appropriate single design, size, weight, and composition to be fixed by the Director of the Mint with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 2. Such commemorative medals shall be delivered to the duly authorized officers of Greenwich Tercentenary Committee upon payment to the Director of the Mint of an amount to be fixed by the Director of the Mint, not less than the estimated cost of manufacture, including labor, materials, dies, use of machinery, and overhead expenses; and security satisfactory to the Director of the Mint shall be furnished to indemnify the United States for the full payment of such cost.

SEC. 3. Whoever shall falsely make, forge, or counterfeit, or cause or procure to be falsely made, forged, or counterfeited, or shall aid in falsely making, forging, or counterfeiting any medal issued under the provisions of this act, or whoever shall sell or bring into the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof from any foreign place, or have in his possession any such false, forged, or counterfeited medal, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than 2 years, or both.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MILLER in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. HUGHES, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Bernard Fitch to be United States marshal for the district of Connecticut.

Mr. PITTMAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the following nominations:

Wayne Bezona, of Washington, to be United States marshal for the eastern district of Washington; and Artis J. Chitty, of Washington, to be United States marshal for the western district of Washington.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

He also, from the same committee, reported adversely the nomination of Edna Koehler to be postmaster at Fredericksburg, Pa.

CONVENTION WITH FRANCE—DOUBLE TAXATION

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported favorably without amendment Executive A (76th Cong., 3d sess.), a convention between the United States of America and France, signed at Paris on July 25, 1939, for the avoidance of double taxation and the establishment of rules of reciprocal administrative assistance in the case of income and other taxes, and also a protocol appended thereto, signed on the same day, which is made an integral part thereof, and he submitted a report (Ex. Rept. No. 7) thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the first nomination on the calendar.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of John Monroe Johnson to be Interstate Commerce Commissioner.

Mr. McCARRAN. I ask that this nomination go over until Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination will be passed over.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Edward H. Davidson to be assistant chief inspector of locomotive boilers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, as Mr. Davidson's nomination was originally sent to the Senate he was named as assistant chief inspector. I introduced a measure, which has since become law, changing the title of this position from "assistant chief inspector" to "assistant director of locomotive inspection." The duties of the position are in no way affected by the legislation approved by the President on April 22, 1930.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of W. A. Ayres to be Federal Trade Commissioner.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Clyde L. Seavey to be a member of the Federal Power Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

WORK PROJECTS ADMINISTRATION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Carl W. Smith to be administrator for Washington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed. That concludes the Calendar.

REMOVAL OF RESTRICTION ON USE OF LAID-UP VESSELS

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, there is on the calendar Senate Joint Resolution 246, Order of Business 1608, which was introduced by the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. There is likewise on the calendar an identical measure, which came over from the House day before yesterday, House Joint Resolution 519, Calendar No. 1632. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the House joint resolution.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 519) to suspend section 510 (g) of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, during the present European war, and for other purposes, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That section 510 (g) of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as amended (restricting the use of vessels in the laid-up fleet of the Maritime Commission), is hereby suspended until the proclamation issued by the President on November 4, 1939, under section 1 (a) of the Neutrality Act of 1939 is revoked.

SEC. 2. At any time prior to revocation of the proclamation issued by the President on November 4, 1939, under section 1 (a) of the Neutrality Act of 1939, all vessels transferred to the Maritime Commission by the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, or otherwise acquired by the Commission (other than vessels constructed under the Merchant Marine Act, 1936) may, notwithstanding any provision of law contrary hereto or inconsistent herewith, be sold or chartered by the Commission, upon competitive bids and after due advertisement, upon such terms and conditions (including with respect to charters the charter period) and subject to such restrictions (including restrictions affecting the use or disposition of the vessel by the purchaser or charterer), as the Commission may deem necessary or desirable for the protection of the public interest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, Senate Joint Resolution 246 will be indefinitely postponed.

RECESS

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 26 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, May 9, 1940, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, MAY 8, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed Lord God, come Thou to our waiting hearts and minds. Forgive us everything which is unworthy of the holy name which we have taken upon our lips. As high and patriotic tasks are set before us help us to fulfill them in accordance with the very best traditions of our Republic. Do Thou direct the Congress in the solution of its problems and questions, and may it eagerly seek the best and the wisest. Dispel all earth-born clouds, and be gracious unto the whole family of our citizens. Come to us in the light of Him who fulfills our hopes, dreams, and aspirations. Almighty God, truly Thou hast written Thy hand upon the pages of this radiant world. May we be still and feel its unspoken silences; keep us alive to the unutterable wonders of the springtime of promise; alive to walk its kindly, brotherly ways; alive to know that the essence of life is divine and that we are to be alive more and more forever. In the blessed name of our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 28 and 29 to the bill (H. R. 8319) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Departments of State, Commerce, and Justice, and for the judiciary, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 3828. An act to amend section 107 of the Judicial Code, as amended, to eliminate the requirement that suitable accommodations for holding the court at Winchester, Tenn., be provided by the local authorities.

POINT OF ORDER

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold the point of order until the Chair can recognize gentlemen for personal requests? The Chair will entertain only personal requests.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein a speech delivered by Postmaster General Farley before the Sales Executives Club.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by including a telegram addressed to me.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a statement by Col. Sidney D. Waldon, of Detroit, Mich., chairman of the highway and legislative committee of the American Automobile Association. This statement is rather long, but it is on a subject on which the people are entitled to have information.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an article and a speech delivered by the very capable head of the F. B. I., J. Edgar Hoover.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered, I may address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a few letters on the Wheeler-Lea bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPRINGER asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include therein a resolution from the employees of the world's largest railroad shops in support of the Wheeler-Lea railroad bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the effect of Reorganization Plan No. IV on the Soil Conservation Service.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein two tables with reference to water transportation in 1937 and 1938, and a letter from the Mississippi Valley Association.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot recognize the gentleman for that purpose. The point of order has been made that a quorum is not present, and the Chair announced that he would entertain only personal requests.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a letter from Mr. E. M. Reece, chairman of the First National Farm Loan Association of Los Angeles, in support of the Jones-Wheeler bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, and include therein two telegrams from pilots from Billings, Mont.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SABATH. The Speaker stated that a point of order had been made and is now pending. I have just come from a meeting of the Rules Committee, and I did not know who had made the point of order. However, I notice we are still proceeding to grant unanimous-consent requests to extend remarks.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announced, probably before the gentleman from Illinois came on the floor, that the Chair would only recognize gentlemen for the purpose of extending their remarks in the RECORD at this juncture.

Mr. FERGUSON asked and was given permission to revise and extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a speech made by myself on April 26.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan makes a point of order there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eighty-eight Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 97]

Chapman	Hendricks	Merritt	Shannon
Claypool	Hook	Mills, La.	Starnes, Ala.
Crowe	Jacobsen	Mitchell	Steagall

Gwynne	Martin, Ill.	Schulte	Whelchel
Harness	Mason	Shafer, Mich.

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 383 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. IV

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEA. Are we to understand that a vote in the affirmative or for the resolution is to disapprove the transfer proposed by the reorganization plan?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the best answer to that inquiry is to read the resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Congress does not favor the Reorganization Plan No. IV transmitted to Congress by the President on April 11, 1940.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 60

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Congress does not favor the Reorganization Plan No. IV transmitted to Congress by the President on April 11, 1940.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 232, nays 153, answered "present" 2, not voting 43, as follows:

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL, 1941—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report upon the bill H. R. 8202, making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri calls up the conference report upon the agricultural appropriation bill, 1941, and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8202) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report as to each of such amendments, namely:

Correction of totals, etc.

The following amendments relate to the correction of totals, allocations, corrections of text, etc.: Amendments Nos. 2, 4, 5, 8, 10, 11, 12, 13, 15, 16, 20, 21, 23, 24, 32, 33, 39, 42, 43, 48, 53, 54, 65, 66, 68, 77, 78, 80, 83, 87, 93, 101, 104, and 111.

Office of Information

On amendment No. 1, printing and binding: Appropriates $1,637,435, instead of $1,590,000 as proposed by the House and $1,684,870 as proposed by the Senate, of which not more than $90,000 shall be for printing and binding for the Rural Electrication Administration.

Office of Experiment Stations

On amendment No. 3, Hawaii: Appropriates $67,500, instead of $65,000 as provided by the House and $70,000 as proposed by the Senate.

Extension Service

On amendment No. 7, Puerto Rico: Appropriates $90,000, instead of $75,000 as proposed by the House and $128,000 as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment No. 9, extension information: Appropriates $240,000, instead of $225,000 as proposed by the House and $250,000 as proposed by the Senate.

Weather Bureau

On amendment No. 14: Retains the Senate increases of $29,000 for four maps and forecasts daily for additional areas, and of $17,000 to establish a station at Swan Island, West Indies; and eliminates the Senate increases of $20,000 for additional radiosonde stations, and of $50,000 for additional commercial airway meteorological service.

Bureau of Animal Industry

On amendment No. 18, eradicating cattle ticks: Appropriates $325,000, instead of $300,000, as proposed by the House, and $340,000, as proposed by the Senate.

Bureau of Dairy Industry

On amendment No. 22, dairy investigations: Retains the Senate increase of $10,000 for studies of dairy-herd-improvement records.

Bureau of Plant Industry

On amendment No. 25, cotton and other fiber crops and diseases: Appropriates $403,345, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $400,000, as proposed by the House.

On amendment No. 26, fertilizer investigations: Appropriates $240,000 as proposed by the Senate, instead of $225,000, as proposed by the House. The increase of $15,000 above the House figure is for the expense of relocating the fertilizer investigations laboratories and moving them to Beltsville, Md.

On amendment No. 27, forest pathology: Appropriates $245,000, instead of $200,000 as proposed by the House, and $255,000 as proposed by the Senate, the increase of $45,000 above the House figure to be distributed to the items, and in the amounts, indicated herein, in addition to the amounts set up for such items by the Department under the House figure, namely: to little leaf disease of short leaf pines, $15,000; to blister rust investigations, $5,625; to Dutch elm disease investigations, $16,875; and to forest chestnut disease investigations, $7,500.

On amendment No. 28, fruit and vegetable crops and diseases: Appropriates $1,300,000, instead of $1,250,000, as proposed by the House, and $1,350,000, as proposed by the Senate. Of the increase of $50,000 above the House figure, $10,000 is for additional seed-breeding work in connection with peanuts.

On amendment No. 29, irrigation agriculture: Appropriates $133,500, instead of $125,000, as proposed by the House, and $152,674, as proposed by the Senate. The increase of $8,500 above the House figure is for the United States Umatilla Field Station at Hermiston, Oreg. The Senate increases for the United States Yuma Field Station at Bard, Calif., the Scotts Bluff Field Station at Mitchell, Nebr., and for irrigation studies in Maryland are eliminated.

On amendment No. 30, plant exploration and introduction: Appropriates $224,533, instead of $200,000 as proposed by the House and $246,749 as proposed by the Senate. The reduction of $23,149 under the 1940 appropriation is to be applied to work on rubber and to the several other types of work carried on under this appropriation in proportion to their respective 1940 allotments.

On amendment No. 31, sugar-plant investigations: Appropriates $315,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $300,000, as proposed by the House.

Forest Service

On amendment No. 34, relating to the limit of cost of $7,500 for any building purchased, erected, or improved: Retains the House provision that such limit shall apply to the total cost of such building, instead of the Senate provision that such limit shall be as to the expenditure out of Forest Service appropriations for such building.

On amendment No. 35, national forest protection and management: Appropriates $11,500,000, instead of $10,000,000, as proposed by the House, and $12,005,785, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment No. 36, White Mountain National Forest: Retains the Senate provision reappropriating and making available, for the same purposes as originally appropriated, for the fiscal year 1941 the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $500,000 (the unexpended balance estimated at not to exceed $40,000) for hurricane clean-up work, carried in the First Deficiency Appropriation Act, 1939, and made available by that act until June 30, 1940.

On amendment No. 38, forest products: Appropriates $632,500, instead of $600,000, as proposed by the House, and $665,000, as proposed by the Senate.

Bureau of Agricultural Chemistry and Engineering

On amendment No. 46, agricultural chemical investigations: Strikes out the Senate increase of $13,200 for additional laboratory equipment and expansion of the investigational program at the Winter Haven (Fla.) station.

On amendment No. 47, industrial utilization of farm products and by-products: Appropriates $22,550 for work at the Ames (Iowa) laboratory, instead of $45,100, as proposed by the Senate.

The Budget estimate for this appropriation is $191,200.

The House committee and the House eliminated the item entirely on the ground that the activity is a proper one for the four regional research laboratories. The Senate restored $45,100 for the work at Ames, Iowa, which the Department represented the four laboratories will not be properly equipped to take over entirely until the fiscal year 1942.

In this connection, the conferees took note of a statement in the House report concerning the four regional laboratories and agreed to its inclusion here. The statement is as follows:

"At the hearings the Department representatives were challenged to achieve results within 10 years which will consume sufficient surpluses and be of sufficient commercial advantage to justify the expenditures under this head and if not to discontinue the laboratories. This challenge was accepted both by the Bureau chief in charge of the work and by Dr. Jardine, Director of Research for the Department."

On amendments Nos. 49 and 50, agricultural investigations: Eliminates the increase of $30,000 inserted by the Senate for investigations of dust explosions and farm fires, and retains the Senate increase of $10,000 for the construction of a garage and workshop at the Farm Tillage Machinery Laboratory, Auburn, Ala.

On amendment No. 51, agricultural engineering investigations: Eliminates language inserted by the Senate earmarking $10,000 of this appropriation for the construction of a garage and workshop at the Farm Tillage Machinery Laboratory, Auburn, Ala. The earmarking language being carried in the immediately preceding paragraph of this statement its inclusion in the bill is not considered essential, and it has therefore been eliminated.

On amendment No. 52, naval-stores investigations: Retains the Senate increase of $4,000 for painting at Naval Stores Station, Olustee, Fla.

Bureau of Entomology and Plant Quarantine

On amendment No. 55, fruit insects: Provides $11,916, instead of $14,000, as proposed by the Senate, for nut-insect investigations, the amount provided to be expended at the field laboratories at Albany, Ga.

On amendment No. 56, Mexican fruitfly control: Appropriates $167,960, instead of $160,460, as proposed by the House, and $175,460, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment No. 57, forest insects: Appropriates $212,500, instead of $200,000, as proposed by the House, and $225,000, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment No. 58, cereal and forage insects: Appropriates $379,500, instead of $367,000, as proposed by the House, and $392,000, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment No. 59, barberry eradication: Appropriates $162,500, instead of $150,000, as proposed by the House, and $175,000, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment No. 62, insects affecting man and animals: Appropriates $181,500, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $150,000, as proposed by the House.

On amendment No. 63, control investigations: Makes mandatory, as proposed by the House, instead of permissive, as proposed by the Senate, the expenditure of not less than $10,000 for methyl bromide investigations.

On amendment No. 64, insecticide and fungicide investigations: Appropriates $125,000, as proposed by the House, instead of $134,984, as proposed by the Senate.

Bureau of Agricultural Economics

On amendment No. 67, economic investigations: Appropriates $775,000, instead of $750,000, as proposed by the House, and $800,000, as proposed by the Senate.

Agricultural Marketing Service

On amendment No. 69, marketing farm products: Appropriates $400,000, as proposed by the House, instead of $425,000, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment No. 70, crop and livestock estimates: Appropriates $725,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $700,000, as proposed by the House.

On amendment No. 71, market inspection of farm products: Appropriates $459,000, as proposed by the House, instead of $475,000, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment No. 72, Tobacco Inspection and Tobacco Stocks and Standards Acts: Appropriates $433,000, instead of $425,000, as proposed by the House, and $442,187, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendments Nos. 73 and 74, market news service: Retains the Senate increase of $25,000 to take care of a 50-percent increase in telegraph rates, and eliminates the remaining Senate increase of $30,000; retains the Senate language earmarking $5,000 of the appropriation for market news service at New Orleans, La.

On amendment No. 75, Perishable Agricultural Commodities and Produce Agency Acts: Appropriates $152,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $140,000, as proposed by the House.

On amendment No. 76, Standard Container Acts: Appropriates $10,000, instead of $20,000, as proposed by the Senate.

Enforcement of the Commodity Exchange Act

On amendment No. 79: Appropriates $575,000, instead of $500,000, as proposed by the House, and $623,380, as proposed by the Senate.

Food and Drug Administration

On amendment No. 81, enforcement of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act: Retains $7,500 of the Senate increase of $15,000 for an additional amount for inspection of vitamin products.

On amendment No. 82, enforcement of the Tea Importation Act: Eliminates the appropriation of $30,094 inserted by the Senate for the enforcement of this act.

Soil Conservation Service

On amendment No. 84, soil- and moisture-conservation and land-use operations, demonstrations, and information: Retains $1,000,000 of the Senate increase of $1,700,000 for additional cooperation with soil-conservation districts established under State laws.

On amendment No. 86, emergency erosion control, Everglades region, Florida, relating to the provision requiring matching by the State of Florida: Retains the language inserted by the Senate permitting such matching to be made by a political subdivision of such State.

Conservation and use of agricultural land resources

On amendments Nos. 88 and 89, soil-conservation and domestic-allotment payments: Appropriates $438,560,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $498,560,000, as proposed by the House, and reappropriates as proposed by the Senate, not to exceed $60,000,000 of the unobligated balances of the appropriations made for this purpose by the regular act for 1940 and by the First Deficiency Appropriation Act, 1940.

On amendment No. 91, soil-conservation and domestic-allotment payments: Eliminates the provision inserted by the House and stricken out by the Senate making immediately available such amounts of this appropriation as may be necessary to reimburse the 1940 appropriation for obligations on account of grants of aid, advances for the 1940 crop-insurance program, and county-association expenses for the 1940 agricultural conservation program. The provision is eliminated from this bill for the reason the matters referred to have been provided for in the First Deficiency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1940.

On amendments Nos. 92 and 94, relating to grants of aid in lieu of cash for compliances under the agricultural conservation program: Authorizes advances for the cost of "any soil-terracing services," instead of "any soil-conserving services," as proposed by the Senate.

The Sugar Act of 1937

On amendments Nos. 97 and 98: Appropriates $46,675,000 plus an unexpended balance of $1,300,000 of a former appropriation, making in all $47,975,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $47,500,000, as proposed by the House.

Cooperative farm forestry

On amendment No. 106: Appropriates $400,000, as proposed by the House, instead of $477,898, as proposed by the Senate. The reduction of $77,898 is to be prorated to the three subprojects covered by the appropriation on the basis of the respective Budget estimates therefor.

Rural Electrification Administration

On amendment No. 108, relating to administrative promotions: Restores the language inserted by the House and stricken out by the Senate, amended to read as follows (the amending language being in italic type): "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used to pay the salary of any person who received as many as three steps of administrative within-grade promotion, or the equivalent thereof, in all positions occupied by such person during the fiscal year 1939, at a rate of pay in excess of the salary resulting from the first two steps of such promotion or its equivalent; but this proviso shall not preclude the payment of the minimum salary of the grade to any person transferred, under standard regulations, to such grade."

It is the purpose of the modification to protect the promotions of those employees in nonclassified positions whose salary increases were justifiable because of transfer to positions of higher responsibility, but to maintain the provisions of the House language in the case of those promotions of the nonclassified personnel which were not occasioned by such change in duty as would have justified a reallocation, under Classification Act standards, if the position had been classified. The present authority of the Secretary of Agriculture will enable him to effectuate this purpose through appropriate administrative action.

On amendment No. 109, loans: Strikes out, as proposed by the Senate, the language inserted by the House making a direct appropriation of $40,000,000 for rural-electrification loans. The managers have brought back in disagreement (amendment No. 110) the language of the Senate authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to advance $40,000,000 in loans to the R. E. A. for this purpose.

On amendment No. 112, Beltsville Research Center: Retains the Senate increase of $1,620 for the employment of a nurse.

Farm Credit Administration

On amendment No. 113: Retains the Senate increase of $20,000.

The committee of conference have not agreed with respect to the following Senate amendments:

On amendment No. 6, Extension Service: An appropriation of $203,000, inserted by the Senate, to carry out the act of April 24, 1939, "An act to provide for the further development of cooperative agricultural extension work."

On amendment No. 17, animal husbandry: A Senate increase of $10,000 above the amount of $15,000 provided by the House, for cooperative studies of beef-cattle production in the Southeastern States.

On amendment No. 19, eradicating cattle ticks: The Senate has inserted language making not to exceed $5,000 of this appropriation available for the purchase of beef with which to supply the Seminole Indians of the Big Cypress Swamp area, Hendry County, Fla., during the time that deer infested with cattle ticks are being removed from said area and until such area is restocked with deer.

On amendment No. 37, range investigations: A Senate increase of $25,935, of which $10,000 is in addition to $15,000 provided by the House for cooperative studies in connection with the project for beef-cattle production in the Southeastern States. The animal husbandry phases of these studies are covered by amendment No. 17, above. The remaining $15,935 of the Senate increase is for restoration of the Budget cut under this appropriation.

On amendment No. 40, New England hurricane damage, relating to the requirement for State matching: The Senate has inserted the words, "heretofore or hereafter," so that funds contributed at any time for this work may be taken into account in determining whether a State has complied with the matching requirement.

On amendment No. 41, acquisition of lands for national forests: Eliminates the Senate increase of $1,000,000 above the $1,000,000 provided by the House.

On amendments Nos. 44 and 45, forest roads and trails: The Senate has provided $10,000,000, instead of $7,500,000, as proposed by the House.

On amendment No. 60, pink bollworm and Thurberia weevil control: The Senate has provided an appropriation of $909,608, instead of $526,800 as proposed by the House.

On amendment No. 61, white-fringed beetle control: Appropriates $600,000 for the control and prevention of spread of white-fringed beetle.

On amendments Nos. 85 and 107, relating to the purchase of nursery stock by the Soil Conservation Service and under the appropriation for cooperative farm forestry: Continues available for expenditure for not more than 3 fiscal years any portions of these appropriations allocated for the production or procurement of nursery stock. This provision is to enable the Department to enter into contracts with nurseries for the purchase of such nursery stock as the Department believes can be obtained in this manner at a lower cost than where grown by the Department in its own nurseries.

On amendment No. 90, relating to administrative expenses in Washington and in the field under the appropriation of $438,560,000 for domestic allotment payments: Authorizes, for such expenses, 1 percent and 2 percent, respectively, of the amount originally estimated for this appropriation, namely, $498,560,000, instead of the amount remaining as the result of the transfer of $60,000,000 of such estimate to the 1940 appropriation.

On amendment No. 95, relating to the same item as amendment No. 90, above: Provides for interchangeability, between the District of Columbia, the regional offices, and the several States, of the limitations set up in the law for administrative expenses in the categories named.

On amendment No. 96, relating to domestic allotment payments: Validates such payments for operations in 1938 and 1939 by tenants and sharecroppers on cropland owned by the United States Government.

On amendment No. 99, parity payments: The Senate has appropriated $212,000,000.

On amendment No. 100, disposal of surplus commodities: The Senate has appropriated $85,000,000. This appropriation covers the food-stamp operations as well as other means of surplus disposal.

On amendments Nos. 101, 102, and 103, farm tenancy: Provides an appropriation of $2,500,000 for administrative expenses and authorizes the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to lend $50,000,000 to the Secretary of Agriculture for farm-tenant loans.

On amendment No. 105, water facilities, arid and semiarid areas: The Senate has appropriated $500,000.

On amendment No. 110, R. E. A. loans: The Senate provision authorizes and directs the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to lend $40,000,000 for this purpose and increases by $40,000,000 the total amount of notes, bonds, debentures, and other such obligations which the Corporation is authorized to have outstanding at any one time.

CLARENCE CANNON,
M. C. TARVER,
W. P. LAMBERTSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the managers on the part of the House present the conference report on the agricultural appropriation bill. It has been somewhat delayed, but even at that, we submit it far in advance of the date on which the agricultural appropriation conference report usually has been submitted to the House for the last several years. It is one of the largest general appropriation bills; one of the most controversial, and is perhaps of wider application; affects directly a larger number of people, and is of more interest to the country generally than any other of the general appropriation bills.

It is the only available vehicle for direct farm relief; the only bill through which we can carry into effect any pledges which may have been made by any party for agricultural equality and for any measure of maintenance of parity prices on farm products. For that reason it was somewhat of a surprise when the Budget estimates were received to note that in the long program of retrenchment supposed to affect equally all branches of the Government and to curtail uniformly expenditures in all general appropriation bills the farm bill was singled out for especial attention, and that the Budget Bureau had elected to cut out of the farm bill 40 percent of all of the retrenchments which it proposed to make in its economy program for the fiscal year.

Now, we appreciate the necessity for retrenchment. No one can close his eyes to the fact that with the close of this Congress we will have reached the statutory debt limit, if in fact, we have not already passed it. The committee to which this bill has been entrusted realize, along with the rest of the House, that we have already reached a position where we have before us three alternatives, if you may be said to have three alternatives more than two alternatives. We must do one of three things. We must raise the debt limit or we must increase taxes or we must retrench expenditures. There is no other course open.

In the face of this situation, we yield as gracefully as we may to the inevitable and endeavored to cooperate by a choice of what we consider the lesser of the three evils—a retrenchment of expenditure and a smaller bill. In doing so we have endeavored to include provisions which would contribute to price maintenance and if reductions must be made to apply them judiciously where they would interfere least with the efficient operation of the department and any possible benefits to the farm and the farmer.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Yes, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I would like to have the gentleman's opinion on the agricultural price situation as it exists today in this respect: Corn and wheat are both above 75 percent of parity. Benefit payments that have been made in the past are contemplated on paying up to 75 percent of parity. The cotton price is below 75 percent of parity. Just how will this money be divided that is provided in the conference report and upon which we will have to vote if it is approved? Will corn and wheat get anything, or will it all go to cotton?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. If the gentleman will withhold his question until we reach that particular Senate amendment, we will have opportunity to discuss it more fully.

When the bill was messaged over to the Senate, amendments were added providing for expenditures in excess of the bill for the current year. Although the bill for 1940 was the largest ever passed for the purpose, the total obligations added by the Senate totaled $30,000,000 over those carried by this year's bill.

In agreeing to Senate amendments we favored those which were calculated to affect most directly the price of farm products and to that extent the standard of living on the farm. There is generally a great misconception of conditions on the farm and the rural standard of living.

Whenever farm needs are mentioned or a request is made that some of the legislative favors so freely granted to labor and industry be extended to include agriculture we are invariably met with the statement: "Oh, out there in the country you are at least insured of one thing: You always have plenty to eat." You may be surprised to know that there is more undernourishment, more malnutrition on the American farm than in the American city. In the draft of 1917, when we brought in the young men from every community to examine them for Army service, it was a matter of surprise to learn that undernourishment, malnutrition, and underweight was far more prevalent among the young men from the rural districts than from the urban areas.

Dr. Alexander, of the Department of Agriculture, said, in a report on 100 typical rural families, that they found in the 100 families more than 1,300 definite health handicaps due to malnutrition. There were in those 100 families 175 cases of rickets and a large number of suspected tuberculosis and pellagra cases, all of them nutritional diseases, brought on by lack of proper diet.

Another report of the Department condemned the practice of farm families in the sale of the butter produced on the farm and the use of substitutes, and called attention to the fact that because of the practice, the eyesight of farm children was deficient, due to the lack of certain vitamins. It is a condition prevalent in the country, even in the dairy districts. An investigation of the average farm table will show that due to the fact that the income is so small, and the necessity of finding money for taxes and interest is so imperative, all food that is salable is sent to market.

To a large extent on many farms, the food which is not marketable is served on the farm table.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The gentleman has referred to the dairy sections. Our men out in the dairy sections may look anemic, but that is because of their work. They start to work at 5 o'clock in the morning and work until midnight in order to make enough money under these low prices to pay their taxes, interest, and other debts; but they do get good nourishment. It is the hard work that makes them look anemic.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I fully agree with the gentleman that it takes long hours and hard work on any farm, especially a dairy farm, and a greater technical training than is required in most any trade, but I am rather inclined to think that if he will investigate he will find his section is no exception to the rule. Along the line the gentleman has indicated, an investigation by the Department shows that farm women average 5 to 7 pounds lighter than nonfarm women.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. STEFAN. I want to confirm what the gentleman has said about many farmers bringing their butter into town and selling it in order to secure money. In many cases they buy substitutes. What the gentleman says about that is absolutely true.

I am tremendously interested in learning where the gentleman secured his authority for the statement that the substitutes consumed by these farmers resulted in some ill health. Will the gentleman give me that information? Because I have been told by those who are promoting the sale of substitutes that the substitutes are just as good in all categories as the real butter that is produced on the farm. Will the gentleman give us that information?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. It was taken from a report issued by the Department of Agriculture, which I shall be glad to hand to the gentleman when I have access to my papers.

Mr. STEFAN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. One of the vitamins in butter is vitamin A, a rare vitamin, lack of which affects the eyesight. The report states in this connection that our own experience is corroborated by the experience of farmers in Denmark, which is a butter-producing country and in which the custom prevails on many farms of selling the butter and using substitutes on the farm table. Because the children do not have access to vitamin A found in butter the eyesight of the Danish children is materially affected.

Mr. STEFAN. And that vital substance in butter cannot be found in these substitutes they are feeding the people today.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. No; this particular vitamin, vitamin A, is not found in the usual butter substitutes.

My labor friends have a splendid program, a program of a floor under wages and a ceiling over hours, and, among many other important planks in their platform, one against child labor. We should take a leaf out of their book. In no industry in the country is child labor so prevalent as on the farm. In a report from the Department of Agriculture is the following statement. I quote:

> Child labor in agriculture is not of a beneficial kind. Many children work from 8 to 12 hours a day, and that, as a result, do not do well in school, and are from two to three grades behind the normal grade for their age.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The other day when the wage-hour bill was under discussion the gentleman from Massachusetts made an observation and quoted one of our high church officials. I interrogated the gentleman from Massachusetts on that because I wanted some additional information relative to the statement made by the church official. He narrowed the observation made by the church official to wages earned by, we will say, industrial workers.

But the gentleman from Missouri is now developing the thought that was in my mind, namely, that we have given practically no consideration whatsoever in the past several years to the wages of the man and woman and their children who work on the farm. Their income is so low that they feel it absolutely necessary for the children to work as the gentleman is now describing. I disagree with their having to work that way, such long hours, to the point of exhausting their bodies; and I congratulate the gentleman from Missouri on developing this particular thought, which should have been developed in the wage-hour discussion the other day.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The gentleman from Michigan touches on one of the great needs in our national economy—the need of legislation to solve farm problems already solved for other industries.

Of course, the major farm problem is a price problem. Give the farmer a wage for his labor and a price for his product and he will pay his taxes and interest and buy his own farm. If you will solve the price problem you have solved the tenancy problem, the credit problem, and every other agricultural problem.

In the period following the war, when we had adequate farm prices, tenancy decreased, but in the period of the depression tenancy increased at a heavier rate than in any decade in our economic history. If you give the farmer a fair price for his products we will solve the problem of tenancy, and that is the only way we shall be able to do it.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I would like to have the gentleman's authority for the statement that farm tenancy decreases during times of high prices but increases during times of low prices. It has been my experience that it is rather the other way around, because speculative land values were up so that people began to buy land in quantity when prices were high. I favor high prices, but I think we must be careful to see that those benefits go at least in fair measure to the small landowner rather than all to the large landowner.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Answering the gentleman from Texas, the statistics show that more tenants made enough money to buy farms in 1919 than ever before, and more farm owners lost their farms during the depression of 1930–33 than ever before in our history.

You can pick the best farmer in the United States, give him the best farm in the United States, and if you do not give him cost of production it is only a question of time before he will lose the farm. Only one thing will keep men who own land on their farms, and that is fair prices.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman so far as the desirability of the price structure is concerned, and that that is the way to keep them there; but when you purchase land on a long-time basis, the better time for a man to purchase a farm is in a period of low land prices rather than to purchase during a period of high speculative land prices and have to pay when there will be several high-and-low-price periods. I think the gentleman will find, if he will investigate the statistics, that when prices are high, and that is one of the unfortunate things about it, men begin to buy large tracts of land. We have a good many suit-case farmers developed in those periods. That is why I think it is desirable to have family-sized purchases on a basis that is limited to that type of farmer. The tenant home purchase is on that basis.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The only way to interpret the gentleman's remarks is, there are times when the farmer ought not to have high prices.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I did not say that at all. I say if you have high prices alone, you tend to develop ownership in too few people's hands. You have to have the two programs hooked together. I thoroughly believe in a high-price structure.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. No one will say we should not pay labor fair wages because it will give men money to buy homes, and the price of homes will go up. Anyone who says that we ought not pay fair prices for farm goods, because if we do the land prices might go up, is not much interested in agriculture.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I hope the gentleman will not put words in my mouth. I did not say any such thing. I said high prices are desirable, but the gentleman will find, if he will investigate the farm tenancy situation in this and other countries, that frequently land speculation develops alongside high prices. You have to attend to both at the same time.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. If speculation in homes develops in the cities in which wage earners are receiving wages sufficient to enable them to buy their own homes, that is no reason why wages should be lowered.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. And if a decent wage and a fair price for farm products enable farmers to buy farms and increase the price of land, that is no reason why farm prices should be lowered below 75 percent of parity.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. May I say to the gentleman from Missouri that a cotton farmer gets 1 cent an hour for every cent a pound he gets for his lint cotton. When cotton is 10 cents a pound he is getting 10 cents an hour for his work, yet you fixed industrial wages at a minimum of 25 cents or 30 cents an hour. Cotton farmers are in competition with all other farmers.

You people in the Corn Belt, you people in the Wheat Belt and in the Cattle Belt just remember that if you continue to hold the cotton farmers at this disparity they are going to take your farming away from you; so unless we do something to wipe out this vast disparity between industrial prices and agricultural wages or income that we have not done yet, why, you are going to have poverty on the farm, and that is going to bring catastrophe to the country.

Mr. STEFAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. For a question.

Mr. STEFAN. I merely want to observe, in answer to the gentleman from Mississippi, if the cotton farmer is getting only 1 cent an hour, what does the hog-slopping farmer in Nebraska receive when he gets only 4 cents a pound for his hogs?

Mr. RANKIN. He is getting the slop in comparison with the prices he pays for industrial commodities.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The farmer has cooperated with labor. They have a common cause. Labor is in the market for farm products and the farmer is in the market for labor products. We heartily approve every law that has been passed by this Congress for labor. Personally, I have voted for every major piece of labor legislation that has been passed. I have supported every proposition to provide relief for the city, and we believe that labor is ready to return the favor and provide a living wage for farm labor and a fair price for farm products.

It is to be regretted that with hogs selling at a nickle and cotton at a dime, while labor and industry are above parity, the Committee on Agriculture has not seen fit to bring out at any time during this Congress any kind of a bill which would do for farm prices what Congress has already done for union wage scales and industrial price schedules. No committee in the history of the House has had such an opportunity, no committee has been charged with such an obligation, and no committee in the history of the House has failed so lamentably in that duty and in that obligation. Instead of responding to the recommendations of the President and the Secretary of Agriculture and Members of the Congress, and the pleas of every farm organization in America to at least give us the opportunity to consider some constructive measure for fair farm prices, it has consumed the session in trivialities.

According to the newspapers, there was a meeting recently of 31 Members of the House, called to meet in the rooms of the Committee on Agriculture, and which entered into an agreement to support every Senate amendment to this bill.

They abandoned the position of the House, they disregarded the instructions given by the House to the House conferees. These 31 Members agreed among themselves to vote for the Senate and against the House on every amendment. Let us see what the effect of that would be. If we should agree to every Senate amendment, the bill would be $30,000,000—$28,000,000 higher than the bill for the current year. To strike a balance between the bill for 1940 and the pending bill for 1941, add $60,000,000 already appropriated for soil conservation.

Add the $40,000,000 for rural electrification and the $50,000,000 for farm tenancy which this bill authorizes to be borrowed from R. F. C. and you have a bill for $1,072,911,213, which is $30,000,000 more than the $1,042,115,315 for the current year:

1940 appropriation		$1,042,115,315
Passed Senate	$922,911,213
Soil conservation deficit	60,000,000
Rural Electrification Administration	40,000,000
Farm tenancy	50,000,000
		1,072,911,213

At the time of national stringency, when we are above the statutory debt limit, they are flouting the earnest plea of the President and the well-considered program of the Committee on Appropriations as adopted by the House, and all considerations, national and economic, to vote for the largest appropriation bill of its kind ever passed by any legislative body of any nation in any period of the world's history.

It serves to call attention to the fact that there are Members of this House, members of the Committee on Appropriations, who to my certain knowledge have never voted against any appropriation. No prudent businessman would adopt a policy like that, even if we had a vast surplus on hand, and certainly not at a time when there is as serious a necessity for retrenchment as today.

Mr. Speaker, this country will never be destroyed by armed invasion; this country will never be menaced by any power from without. The danger to this country comes from the inside. It comes from Members of Congress who are willing to vote for anything which they think will curry favor at home, and they do it heedlessly, regardless of the merits of the proposition. They will vote for any appropriation on any subject offered to them. Such persons are not real friends of the farmer. They are bringing the farm question into disrepute. They are giving arms to those who oppose farm appropriations, who can say, "Why, here, these men who represent farm districts come in here and vote for every crackpot proposition that can be offered."

I hope the Members of this House will have the courage to be honest with themselves and honest with their constituents. The House managers ask you to vote for those Senate amendments which have real merit and to vote against those which lack merit. This amendment not only lacks merit but it violates the formula adopted after years of study and experiment. It amounts to an imposition on the rest of the States of the Union. We trust you will follow the recommendation of the committee and vote it down. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LAMBERTSON].

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my chairman—and I mean it most sincerely—on the magnificent fight he made in the conference to maintain the House attitude on the 100 increases that we finally compromised on the Agriculture appropriation bill. The Senate had increased the House bill in 113 items. They transferred one item, but they did not reduce a single one. After nearly 3 weeks we finally agreed on 100 items. I do not think any man ever led a finer fight than the chairman of this subcommittee, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON]. We did the very best that seemed possible under the circumstances, and, at that, we yielded two-thirds on the items to which we agreed in order to get a conference report at all.

This is what I want to say generally and primarily. It is against the rules to talk about another body in particular, but this other body has a precedent, which they do not deny, that if individual Members of that body want something in an appropriation bill, the courtesy of the Senate through the last 100 years lets them put it in. That is what we are up against. The conferees, being Members of the Senate, and all having the same general propensity, fight for their colleagues in the conference. The very best we were able to do was to yield two-thirds on 100 items in order to get a report.

I cannot overemphasize the fine manner in which my chairman fought for what we got in the report. I hope the Members on the Republican side will stand by us and the attitude of the House on all these items. There is only one exception that I made to my chairman, only one amendment on which we will disagree. I cannot understand his apparent inconsistency by not going straight down the line, but he has been marvelous on the 112 while he weakens on one.

This is what we are up against with the other body. The other body has appropriated more money each year in 58 continuous years than has the House. There has not been any deviation from this record. The fact has been worked out by a research student that for 58 continuous years the Senate has increased the House appropriations. I have a resolution pending before the House, although I have not been able to get the Committee on Rules to give me a rule on it, by which we take the Senate out of appropriations.

We do not have to change the Constitution to do this. There is good authority for the fact that the House of Representatives alone can do all the appropriating, if we can once get the Senate to agree to let us do it forever. Since they are occupied mainly with other things, perhaps we can get them to do it. I believe a rule should be given for the consideration of this resolution, just to show what we are up against and what we have to contend with in another body on appropriations, at a time when we are to the debt limit of this country—a most serious situation.

I am not going to say anything more now. I will say something on these amendments. We did a fine service against odds, and I doubt if any committee ever did a finer service. There was not one man on the other side over there who was for economy. I am telling you secrets. They were all against us; it did not make any difference whether they were Republicans or Democrats. Over there they are all spenders. Over here it is different, I believe, and I hope that my colleagues on this side, whom I solely had the honor to represent at this conference, will vote for this conference report, and then stay with us on the 14 other amendments. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON].

FARM PARITY PAYMENTS

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, this conference report on the agricultural appropriation bill is a matter in which many of us are vitally interested. I want to urge the passage of the $212,000,000 item for farm parity payments.

Recently we have debated at length in the House the problem of fair wages for industrial labor. All American citizens are entitled to an opportunity to earn a fair share of the Nation's income. I believe in good wages for labor. I would not destroy the laboring man. I believe in doing everything possible to improve the condition of the laboring man. There are not many people in my area in Texas who are engaged in industrial labor, but, as a matter of principle, I will never knowingly cast my vote in opposition to the just demands of the laboring man in the factory, on the farm, or elsewhere.

Numerous Representatives in Congress in recent days have spoken with great feeling about their convictions that every laboring man ought to receive a decent wage. I join in that feeling. I believe that those who represent industrial districts should join with those of us who represent agricultural districts in doing everything within the power of Congress to enable those who labor and produce on the farms to secure a fair wage for their labor and a fair price for their commodities. There are plenty of farmers in this Nation who not only do not receive a wage of 30 or 35 cents an hour for a 40-hour week but who do not receive as much as the equivalent of 10 cents per hour in farm income for a 60-hour week. I cannot believe that the informed people in industry, whether employer or employee, will actually oppose a fair and decent income for the farmer.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAHON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I want to say to the gentleman that I know of no one here who represents a so-called labor block who does not agree with the gentleman, and all we ask is for agriculture to bring us in a program that will help the farmer to get away from that 10-cents-an-hour wage and those low substandards and we will vote with the gentleman on such a program.

Mr. MAHON. I thank the gentleman for his contribution, and in fairness I must say that the Members from the city who have no direct interest in agriculture, have stood by agriculture upon innumerable occasions; of course, this is an agricultural appropriation bill and we cannot legislate now. We can avail ourselves, however, of this opportunity to endeavor to substantially assist the farmers of the Nation.

FARMERS' DISPROPORTIONATE SHARE OF NATIONAL INCOME

We must agree that the farmer is not getting a fair American return on his labor. He is not getting his fair share of the national income. While the farmer constitutes about 25 percent of the population of the Nation, he only secures about 11 percent of the Nation's income. As long as that unhappy situation exists, there will be no complete and adequate cure for the problem of farm tenancy and for the problem of the farmer generally. It is to the end that we may make up that disparity to some extent by this emergency method of parity payments that we propose to appropriate in this bill $212,000,000. I wish there were a better proposal pending, but we can only act on the law as it exists today, this being merely an appropriation bill.

I know that there are those in our country who are getting tired of the plea for the farmer. They have not thought the proposition through. They seem to think that the farmer is separate and apart from our national economy. In those conclusions they are in great error. We cannot survive half slave and half free today any more than we could in 1860. You cannot have a healthy and wholesome condition in our national life when about 32,000,000 of our people are discriminated against in their contest for a fair share of the Nation's income.

No, you cannot do without the farmer. You cannot brush the farmer aside in these days of industrialism with a nonchalant sweep of the hand. He is not a parasite on society. Destroy the farmer and the fruit of his labor and there will be no bread to eat, no milk to drink, no bacon and eggs, no meat, no clothes to wear, of cotton or wool—no shoes, no linens for the beds, no cotton for the mattresses upon which 130,000,000 Americans sleep.

This is not just a problem for the farmer to fight out—it is a problem for the whole Nation. Whether they know it or not, the people in the cities will eventually lose if the farmer continues to lose. All candidates for the Presidential office at this time, so far as I know, are advocating that the farmer shall have a fair share of the Nation's income. The Republican platform and the Democratic platform, in previous years, have approved the idea of a better program for agriculture.

OFFSET TO THE TARIFF NECESSARY

Almost for two centuries the farmer has been fighting an uphill battle. If industry had received no subsidy in the way of a tariff, then agriculture would not be so far behind in the race. But in the race between industry and agriculture, the burdens of industry have been lifted, and additional burdens and shackles have been added to agriculture. Agriculture has not had a chance to win. The cards have been stacked for these many decades against the farmer in his effort to get a fair share of the Nation's income. I quote the following from a statement which was made some time ago by the gentleman from Texas the Honorable MARVIN JONES, the distinguished chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture:

For all purposes agriculture should have an appropriation of at least $900,000,000 per year, but not as a subsidy.

The value of manufactured commodities in the United States in the year 1937 was $60,000,000,000. More than 80 percent of these items are protected by the tariff. The average rate of the tariff, reduced to an ad valorem basis, is approximately 36 percent, according to the Tariff Commission. If this tariff is 33⅓ percent effective, it means increased industrial prices of nearly $6,000,000,000; in other words, a subsidy to business of the major portion of that amount in the terms of the law.

Agricultural commodities, when produced in surplus quantities, receive no benefit from the tariff. Cotton farmers, for instance, are in this class. At the same time they assume the burden of increased prices on the articles they must buy.

So long as we have a tariff the surplus-producing farmer is entitled to an offset by way of restitution and not as a subsidy. Even Alexander Hamilton, patron saint of the tariff, recognized this fact in his Report of Manufacturers in 1791. Thomas Jefferson wrote the principle of equality into the Declaration of Independence before we had a Constitution.

I am not arguing the merits of the tariff; I am simply stating that so long as we have one the surplus-producing farmers should have some provision for placing them on an equality under the law.

I cannot see how the Republicans in the House of Representatives can now vote against parity payments for the farmer and go out in the election campaigns this fall and advocate parity for the farmer as an offset for the tariff. Such hypocrisy should be unthinkable. I urge all Members of the House, whether Democrat or Republican, to vote the $212,000,000 for parity payments to agriculture.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN].

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, today we are to decide whether or not this House will agree to the insertion into the agricultural appropriation bill the sum of $212,000,000 placed in that bill by the Senate. If you Members will recall, last February 2 my suggestion to have the House include this amount at that time was refused.

Some Members contend that the South will obtain the bulk of this $212,000,000 because corn and wheat have reached the wonderful heights of about three-quarters parity, or, in other words, still short of a "square deal" for the farmer that produces wheat and corn by one-quarter. This one-quarter surely contains whatever profit would accrue to those farmers, but, the Congress having decided 5 years ago only on the basis of three-quarters parity, and only to five basic crops, we cannot at this time kick over the entire principle of parity payments on that premise or mistake.

To properly give the farmer of America parity for that portion of his products consumed in America would entail an appropriation of close to $2,000,000,000. To give every farmer a "square deal" and not the ridiculous three-quarters of parity the present act seeks to give, we would have to appropriate here today the same amount as has been appropriated for national defense this year.

Personally, I hope that this appropriation for parity, or three-quarters parity, I should say, for only 5 of the 50 important crops the farmer produces, will be agreed to by this House. Whether the bulk of this goes to cotton, I care not, because next year it might be corn or wheat that will obtain the lion's share. May I suggest to you gentlemen from the dairy States that we might well give this to cotton rather than to see the South go still further into competition with our main agricultural production—dairying.

Surely, the picture today of agriculture is not so encouraging that parity payments should be discarded. Each of the past 7 years we as farmers have been short-changed to the extent of $2,000,000,000 per year compared with the average of the 7 years prior to 1933, and even including the disastrous year of 1932. About $14,000,000,000 "gone with the wind," a sum that would have cleared up the farm indebtedness of the United States. Do you wonder that we demand and have a right to demand any reasonable sum from this Congress? Do you realize that this $212,000,000 together with the $500,000,000 for soil conservation still leaves a balance on the red side of the farmer's ledger for the 1 year of $1,300,000,000?

Mr. Speaker, as long as this administration persists in giving away our great American markets to foreigners, and as long as this same administration continues to sell the farmer down the river so that big business and munitions makers may sell their products abroad, just so long will I personally continue to plead with this House to appropriate money for parity payments. Nor am I under such conditions apologizing in the least for voting for this $212,000,000. Money paid to the farmers of our country to recompense them for producing food for you people from the industrial East at a loss is a just appropriation.

In conclusion, I want to appeal to all of you here today to vote for this amendment even though it will not give parity, nor yet one-half parity to the fundamental, basic industry of America—agriculture. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of the time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, this session of Congress will conclude my eighth year in Congress, and probably one of the most inspiring and sanguinary experiences one can have is to go back and ascertain, and evaluate the problems that were on the doorstep of the Nation when we came here in special session in 1933; then to estimate the total amount that was expended for a solution of those problems; then to evaluate the problems in 1940 and see how far we have come in the direction of a solution. Altogether it is not a very heartening solution, I would say. Here we are discussing the same farm problems that reposed on the threshold of the country in very aggravated degree in 1933, in 1932, in 1931, and in 1930, and we have addressed to that many plans, and many experimental proposals, and the problems are still here, and seemingly do baffle solution. I experience a sense of frustration and despair when I think about them. I join with everybody in the administration for that matter in the hope of finding a solution; yet it has not been found. Day after day there is advanced from the Well of this House some new proposal as a solution for the farm problem, but it is falling on rather sterile soil, because I believe Congress has gotten to a point where it does not take kindly to all the new proposals that have been made. The other day I went back and summarized in my mind all the acts that have been placed on the books in the last 7 or 8 years, and then in turn I reflected on the problems that still perturb us, and made up my mind that while I have not begrudged the money that has been expended, nor the attempts which have been made in the field of agriculture, in the field of business, in the field of labor, in the field of industry, and in the field of social science, in the hope of bringing the country out of its desperation and despair, yet I am not going to lend my vote to any other proposal that in my judgment is unsound and that will embark this country on a great and futile enterprise at the end of which is either a chimerical rainbow or a national dead-end. There is such a proposal in the bill as written by the Senate, and I refer particularly to the question of farm tenancy. I wish I could see eye to eye with some of you gentlemen. I recognize the objective that you have in mind, but in the light of bitter experience that we have had, in the light of the tragic result that has been dished up in this same field of enterprise annually, as addressed to urban communities, I for one am not disposed to go along with that proposal.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Let me go on. You will remember we made no provision for farm tenancy in the House bill. When it went to the Senate, instead of making a direct appropriation they hit upon a back-door or a side-door approach to the Federal Treasury. It is bad enough, and it inspires enough trepidation in the minds and hearts of informed persons on the fiscal subject of this Government that we should lay our hands on money going through the front door of the Federal Treasury for this kind of a program, but it is infinitely worse to take a rather stealthy and furtive approach through the back door, and, by means of increase in the contingent obligations of the Government, to save up the headache for the future. What do our brethren at the other end of the Capitol do? They say, "Oh, we must take care of this tenancy program. Now we can kill two birds with one stone. First, if we do not make a direct appropriation we hold down the total in the bill." And it is a grand and glorious objective, if it was not tied up with that which I regard as a species of fiscal hypocrisy. So the Senate does this. They say, "We will get the money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, we will have the R. F. C. loan to the Farm Security Administration the sum of $50,000,000, and then we will make it possible within the terms of the amendment to raise the outstanding aggregate amount of notes and debentures that the R. F. C. may have outstanding." Now, you see the net result of it. In other words, we hold down the appropriation, and say it is a swell job that we have held down the direct appropriations by twenty-five or fifty million dollars, and we will borrow from the R. F. C. with which to make farm-tenancy loans, and then they become contingent obligations of the Government, and one day they must be paid. When you stop to consider that this program is amortized on a basis of 40 years at 3 percent, there is not a man or woman in this chamber who can begin to estimate or appraise the value of farm lands in any section of this country 40 years from now. There is not a soul in this chamber who can indicate what the land values will be 20 years from now. There is not a soul in this Chamber who other than by guesswork can tell what land values will be 10 years from now.

But here the Senate proposes to continue the farm-tenancy program on a 40-year, 3-percent basis, and in a little while we will be in the identic position of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. Oh, with what spiritual exaltation and with what great exhilaration we addressed ourselves to that debate. I remember the speeches in the Well of this House back in 1933 and 1934. "The value would be there." "We will take more than $3,000,000,000 and make over a million loans to a million home owners. We will save their homes. We will put to shame those glassy-eyed bankers and building and loan sharks." Oh, yes. All approached in the finest of spirit and with the best of purposes in mind. The record is what? Not bankers taking those homes. The Home Owners' Loan has reached in and taken 160,000 of the homes of the people of this country. We sold 80,000. Uncle Sam, the greatest real-estate broker that the world has ever seen since the days of Midas and Croesus and King Solomon. Will it be different on farm tenancy when we make thousands—aye, hundreds of thousands of loans—and then the land values recede, even as the waves receded from King Canute a long time ago. What then? Oh, Uncle Sam will have to reach in. He will have to take back. He will have to protect his loans. He will have to put other tenants on that land. He will be brokering farms in larger degree than he is at the present time. I venture the prophecy, much as I dread making it, that perhaps we will duplicate in the farm domain the experience, the tragic experience, that we now go through in the field of urban financing.

It is not the answer. It is not the answer. What is the answer? It is obvious. Jobs for everybody, because, if a man is working and has enough money with which to meet the installments on the principal of a mortgage he has no trouble. Farm prices? Yes. If there are adequate farm prices we will be able to break the frost line of farm tenancy. But why embark into this field now? Tenancy is increasing by leaps and bounds. I know it because it is there in the record, according to Mr. Alexander, Administrator of the Farm Security Administration. He said it would take $200,000,000 a year to make any kind of a dent in that program. But, meantime, why these loans, when farm prices are still below that level that will pay off the interest and the serial installments upon the principal sum of the mortgage that may have been imposed?

The other day I talked with Mr. Hudson down in the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. Wheat is 79 percent of parity, 21 percent below the parity price. Corn is 71 percent of parity. Cotton is 63 percent of parity. Rice is 61 percent of parity, and tobacco approximately 75 percent of parity. If they cannot make a go, if millions of farmers are saying, "We are on a relief basis because prices are too low," why should we project ourselves further into this kind of program, only to give a man assurance that if he gets a Government loan to purchase a farm he will go broke anyway? I submit to you, is that the kind of a thing we ought to do? I cannot for the life of me see it. I do not believe it is good for agriculture. I do not believe it is good for the basic welfare of the United States of America. If this is a proper approach and it can be shown to me, I will go along freely and wholeheartedly with that kind of a program.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FERGUSON. The gentleman always has a great fund of information and a very fine use of the English language. I would like to have him address himself to the experience of the Farm Tenancy Act since it has been created. So far he has not mentioned the experience of the Farm Tenancy Act in its operation thus far.

Mr. DIRKSEN. O my dear friend from Oklahoma, it is the identic experience that we had with the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. The first balance sheet, the second balance sheet, the third annual balance sheet—why, they came here and with a degree of pride and fine spirit said, "Oh, look at the grand job we have done." And they did. But remember this: The money is to be tied up for a long time. So now we are beginning to get the bad news. You show me that we will not duplicate that experience in the field of farm-tenancy loans, and I would be happy to support such a program.

Mr. FERGUSON. The gentleman admits there has been no bad news yet?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Some of them are delinquent already.

Mr. FERGUSON. Very few.

Mr. DIRKSEN. But I will take those same books and do the same kind of a job and make it look very rosy indeed, when as a matter of fact it is not so rosy.

Mr. FERGUSON. The gentleman has not dwelt on those figures.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I shall.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All time has expired.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HOBBS). The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CANNON of Missouri) there were—ayes 114 and noes 2.

So the conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, amendment No. 6: "Extension work, act of April 24, 1939: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to provide for the further development of cooperative agricultural extension work,' approved April 24, 1939 (53 Stat. 589), $203,000."

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 6.

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, a preferential motion.

Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri moves that the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 6. The gentleman from Washington makes a preferential motion that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM].

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I voted for the conference report just adopted, as apparently did everyone else in the Chamber. I shall vote for the Senate amendment covering the food-stamp operations, to which, I understand, an amendment will be offered reducing the amount to $72,000,000, which was the Budget estimate. I shall vote for that. I shall not vote for the parity amendment nor the farm-tenancy amendment. I may or may not have something to say about that when the time comes. At the present time, at the risk of boring the House, again I want to take up my usual subject of the distressed condition of the Public Treasury. I am afraid many of my colleagues are getting very tired of hearing of that. Unfortunately, we are not apparently paying a great deal of attention to it. I feel something like the villain in the old melodrama of years ago. You remember how in the last act, when he had been frustrated in every attempt to kidnap the heroine and the hero was there gloating over him, having given him a couple of socks in the eye and a punch on the nose, the villain stroked his waxed mustache and said, "Well, I go; but I shall return." So, gentlemen, some of these days somewhere, some Congress, some administration is going to bring the finances of this country into balance. We may wave aside the question now, but it will be back again.

I was very much interested in what my distinguished colleague the gentleman from Illinois said about the farm situation. He pointed out that when he came here in 1933 and from that time on we had been experimenting with the farm proposition but had not solved it. I came here 10 years before that, in 1923. The first thing I remember then was that we were "relieving" the farmers. We have continued that relief program until we have relieved him of about everything that he has. [Laughter.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. TABER. And we have pretty nearly relieved the farmer of all he had.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. That is what I said. The farm problem is not a new one; it is not something we can run right through with. It is a problem that has been here since I have been here, more than 18 years. I expect it was here before that. We have been wrestling with it; we shall continue to wrestle with it until we solve it. We have spent a lot of money for farm relief, for unemployment relief, for business revival. Some of it has been spent wisely; a lot of it has been spent unwisely. Looking back on it, as hindsight, it is easier for us now to see that part of it which was unwisely spent.

There is one experiment that I would like now to see us try, and that experiment is to get our Federal finances back into balance and let Nature do a little work on the subject. [Applause.] I have been wondering lately if there is something radically wrong with me mentally or if it is wrong with somebody else. Somebody is seeing something. I am wondering if it is I. It reminds me of a story I heard of a fellow who rushed into a doctor's office early one morning and said, "Doctor, please come with me immediately to the hotel. My friend is in a terrible condition, and he needs medical attention immediately."

The doctor said, "Well, now, wait a minute; don't get excited; what is the matter with this fellow?"

"Well," he said, "he is in awful shape. He has lost his mind."

The doctor said, "That's bad. Just what has happened to him?"

"Well," he said, "we were out last night and we imbibed a little too generously perhaps, and he is out of his mind, entirely crazy. He is having delirium tremens; he has lost his mind."

The doctor said, "That's too bad. What are the symptoms; is he seeing snakes and pink elephants?"

The man said to the doctor, "No; that's the hell of it, he can't see the things." [Laughter.]

Now, who is seeing these pink elephants around here? Am I seeing them, or maybe they are here. Maybe I exaggerate this matter. But I would like, however, to ask you seriously for a moment, and I am asking you again because I have heretofore reminded you of this, to go back with me to the early days of 1933 when we received a statement in this body on the subject of what deficit financing and an unbalanced Budget would do for the country. This is the President of the United States talking. With the utmost seriousness the President said in 1933:

I point out to the Congress the profound effect upon our national economy.

And he was speaking of a deficit, of an accumulated deficit of $9,000,000,000 when the national debt was $22,000,000,000.

It has contributed to the recent collapse of our banking structure. It has accentuated the stagnation of the economy of all of our people. It has added to the ranks of the unemployed. Our Government's house is not in order, and for many reasons. No effective action has been taken to restore it to order. Upon the unimpaired credit of the United States rests the safety of deposits, the security of insurance policies, the activity of industrial enterprises, the value of our agricultural products, and the availability of employment. The credit of the United States definitely affects these fundamental human values. It therefore becomes our first concern to make secure the foundation. National recovery depends upon it.

Listen to this:

Too often in recent history liberal governments have been wrecked on the rocks of loose fiscal policy. We must avoid this danger.

[Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, in order that the RECORD may be kept clear, it should further be stated that following the above message, the Congress following the leadership of the President of the United States, tried to do something about it. We passed an economy bill, too drastic in many respects, ill-considered, and too hastily considered, although I was one of the three conspirators. But we made the effort to do something about it. One of my fellow conspirators has been promoted to the Federal bench. My minority fellow conspirator has retired to the respectable life of a private citizen. I am still here carrying the flag that the President put into my hands that day. Oh, some will say that conditions have changed. Yes, they have changed; but the changed conditions have made the truth that the President laid down at that time more profound and more fundamental because today we are above the national debt limit, with a national debt of $45,000,000,000.

How do we stand today? What is the accounting as the situation stands today? The President presented a Budget in January calling for reduced public expenditures which would have held our expenditures within the national debt limit and which would have reduced our deficit from $4,000,000,000 this current fiscal year to $2,000,000,000 in the next fiscal year. The House of Representatives set about to do something. The program outlined by the President called for living within the Budget estimate as to appropriations and for the raising of $460,000,000 in additional taxes. We did not raise the taxes and we will not raise the taxes, but Congress has cut the appropriation bills and has reduced them. The gentleman from Missouri and his colleagues on the committee did a magnificent job when they brought the agricultural bill here. The agricultural bill, as it passed the House, was a fair bill for agriculture. It had magnificent benefits in it for agriculture, $500,000,000 for soil-conservation payments and various other splendid benefits for agriculture. As it stands today it is $212,000,000 above the Budget estimate.

Of the 14 bills which have passed the Congress, as they stand today 11 of them are substantially under the Budget estimate, 3 are over, and the agricultural bill as it stands today is $201,986,000 above the Budget. The Labor and Federal Security bill is approximately $60,000,000 above the Budget estimate. The War Department civil functions bill is approximately $1,700,000 above the Budget estimate.

What is the national standing today? Under the President's budget as he sent it here in January, had we lived up to it we would have adjourned this session of Congress $61,000,000 under the debt limit. But how do we stand now? We did not pass the $460,000,000 tax bill. The net result of all appropriation bills is $49,000,000 under the Budget. Add that to the $61,000,000 under the debt limit that we would have had if we had carried out the President's program, gives us $110,000,000 under the national-debt limit. But having failed to pass the $460,000,000 tax bill, we have to deduct that, which leaves us $350,000,000 above the debt limit. There has been an increase in revenues, we are told, of about $200,000 000. So we stand today, right now, not counting relief which is to come afterward, $150,000,000 above the debt limit. The Congress has set up a fiscal program, a program of obligations on the Federal Treasury for the next fiscal year that there will be no money there to meet, and under the law we cannot borrow the money to meet these obligations. Some will say that the Congress will meet again in January. The next Congress, it may be you and I, it may be somebody else, will pass a tax bill or raise the debt limit, it is true, but, of course, we know that somebody is going to have to pay the bill. It is just like sitting down at the desk, writing a check and mailing it out and saying, "I am overdrawn today, but in the good graces of Providence, maybe before the check gets to Indianapolis and back I will get hold of some money to make a deposit and the check will be good when it gets here." That is the kind of financing we are doing.

When this Congress adjourns, having set up a fiscal program of expenditures for the next fiscal year beyond the national debt limit, and having refused either to raise the debt limit or to provide taxes—I hate to say this—I believe it will have established a record for fiscal irresponsibility that has never been established since the founding of our Government. Those are plain words, not pleasant to speak and very unpleasant to hear.

That is not all of the story. Along comes the relief program. In the January Budget there was provided a billion dollars for the fiscal year to take care of it. The Congress is going to be asked to make that billion dollars available in 8 months, which means a relief program of a billion and a half dollars for the next fiscal year. So add another half billion dollars above the debt limit. Then we are told we are going to get additional estimates for the Navy and perhaps for the Army. So, conservatively speaking, we are about to set up a fiscal program that will run from a half billion to a billion dollars over the national-debt limit.

Mr. Speaker, it is hard for me to reconcile such a fiscal policy as that. I do not believe it is fair to the House of Representatives; I do not believe it is fair to the Congress and to the Nation to set up such a policy. I believe it is our duty here and now in this Congress before we adjourn to provide the funds to pay the bills we incur for the American people during the next fiscal year. [Applause.]

What about these large benefits that we are going to provide for unemployment and for the farmers when we have no money there to pay them? How are we going to answer our farmer constituents and our unemployed constituents when we go back home and say, "We voted you parity payments. We voted you a billion and a half dollars for relief." Maybe this man will have read the RECORD or the newspapers. He may say, "Yes, Congressman; but did you see to it that there will be money there to pay the bill when I come to present my little ticket to get it?" You may say, "Do not worry about that. The next Congress will fix that." The same fellow may say, "Now, Congressman, that is a right important thing for you to overlook."

Of course, I did hear of a fellow once who threw a plugged quarter in a collection plate as it passed him in the church. It made a lot of noise as it dropped in the plate, but it did not do much good when they got back in the study to count it. I submit to you that it does little good to agriculture or to the unemployed for us to vote large gratuities or large benefits here today if we are not willing to provide the funds to pay the bill. [Applause.] If these things are right, if these expenditures can be justified, then we ought to be willing to put our hands into somebody's pocket and get the money to pay the bill; that is the acid test but we are not willing to do that. Our constituents would not stand for it.

There is a way it can be done. There is a way out yet. If we will hold this agricultural bill to the Budget estimates, if we will defeat parity when it comes up, and hold the agricultural bill to the Budget estimates, and if we will hold the relief program to a billion dollars for the next fiscal year, then with the increased tax collections we will adjourn the Congress under the national debt limit. I should like to submit that for your consideration and for your thinking as we come to do voting in the remaining days of this session of Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LEAVY].

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, I am going to address myself briefly to the matter that is immediately before us. The gentleman who preceded me made a splendid argument, an argument that could be made not alone on the agricultural appropriation bill but on the Army bill or on the Navy bill; it could be made on any appropriation measure we have. The generalities of it few of us can dispute.

As a member of the Agricultural Subcommittee on Appropriations, being one of eight Members of this House who spent 6 weeks writing the original bill, we worked all through the month of December in the writing of this bill, and I feel that I ought to know at least a little of what the facts are. Only three of the eight of us know what took place in the conference between the House and the Senate. We were not conferees, so we have to guess as to what arguments were advanced. Perhaps sound arguments were advanced for these increases and possibly they were not sound, but I am not in a position, and neither are four other members of this subcommittee, to dispute anything that may have been said between the House and Senate conferees, seven Senators on one side and three House Members on the other.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVY. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma, who also is a member of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I am interested in the gentleman's statement that after he had worked 6 or 7 weeks on the bill he was not one of the conferees. Is it not true that of the 13 subcommittees of the House Appropriations Committee, this is the only subcommittee that does not permit all its members to be appointed as conferees?

Mr. LEAVY. I believe that is true.

Now, I have only 5 minutes given me to discuss an important item—an item that vitally affects 21 States in this Union. Let me adopt the position taken by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] and approve only budgeted items, and if we do this, here is an item that is budgeted, so no charge can be made that we are exceeding a budget. This item came before our committee in the Budget and was there lost by but a slight margin. The Senate wrote it back in the bill, and rightly so, and this is what it is:

We have had Farm Extension Service in the 3,000 and more counties in the United States for years. It is not a partisan matter at all. By reason of a change in allocation made in 1936, even though we spent a million dollars a year more for Extension Service work, there are 21 States in this Union that are going to be compelled to reduce their Extension Service and reduce the number of farm agents and assistants, of whose cost the States and the counties pay 50 percent.

This is not a selfish proposition on my part.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVY. If the gentleman will yield me 5 additional minutes, I will yield. I feel that I should have had 10 minutes to discuss this matter.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I can yield the gentleman an additional minute.

Mr. LEAVY. Very well.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The gentleman says that the States will lose. I hardly believe the gentleman has the official figures before him. Instead of losing funds, these States gain $89,000, and will receive $292,000 more than their share if this amendment should be adopted—and at the expense of the other States.

I shall be pleased to submit the figures for the RECORD.

Mr. LEAVY. As I said, I had no opportunity to hear the discussion in conference.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. It is not a question of the discussion in the conference, it is merely a question of the actual amounts of the appropriations to which the gentleman refers. The figures speak for themselves.

Mr. LEAVY. I refuse to yield any further, with the limited time allotted me.

I know what the facts are. The facts are that the State of Colorado loses 6 agents, the State of Florida loses 4 agents, the State of Idaho loses 4 agents, the State of Maine loses 1, Maryland loses 2, Massachusetts 1, Montana 9, Nebraska 2, Nevada 2, New Jersey 5, New Hampshire 2, New Mexico 3, North Dakota 3, Oregon 7, South Dakota 11, Utah 4, Wyoming 9. You will notice that my State is not included in this list.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVY. I cannot yield unless the gentleman will yield me additional time.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I am glad to yield the gentleman an additional minute, Mr. Speaker.

The positions to which the gentleman refers is out of the gratuity that has been given them in the last Congress or two. They were not provided for in the original appropriation of 1935 to which he refers. As a matter of fact, as compared with the actual amount appropriated in 1935 when the act was adopted, those States have gained $89,000. And if the gentleman's amendment is agreed to they will receive $292,000 more than their share—and of course there is no place from which the increase can come except from the allotments to the other States of the Union. I shall be glad to submit the figures.

Mr. LEAVY. May I say to the gentleman from Missouri that he is uniformly fair in these matters, but in this instance I cannot follow the argument of the gentleman. I know that last year we made this shortage up by an appropriation. It was stricken from the House bill on a point of order and was then written in by the Senate. Following that a bill introduced by our colleague the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] was passed authorizing this particular appropriation. I know that if my motion is voted down and we do not adopt the item the Senate has written in here we are going to deprive 21 States of a service they have had for years, and the State of Washington is not one of those States. This does not take any persons out of the service in the State I represent, but it is clearly one of those cases where the worth and merit entitle this appropriation to support.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVY. I yield to the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. How much do the other 27 States gain—is it not $529,302?

Mr. LEAVY. That is right.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. The other States gain, while these 21 States lose $203,000.

Mr. LEAVY. Twenty-seven States make a gain for the next fiscal year of $529,302.26. We do not object to that; but the 21 States should not be asked to cut a service that the farmers absolutely want.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MUNDT. We have just heard a very impassioned speech on economy, and a very good one. Does not the gentleman feel it is good economy in this instance to restore this item so the farmers may have the benefit of the expert advice and guidance of these county agents?

Mr. LEAVY. I certainly do; and it is not a matter of restoration, it is a matter simply of maintaining that which we have had for quite a number of years.

Mr. MUNDT. Precisely; and it is economy rather than extravagance to help our farmers to become self-supporting.

Mr. LEAVY. Certainly.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. And this has the approval of the Budget Bureau?

Mr. LEAVY. Yes; this is a budgeted item. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE].

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, there are one or two points, I think, which possibly should be made clear. I appreciate the generosity of the gentleman from Washington in suggesting that I was the author of the bill under which this appropriation was made. I cannot claim that distinction. The authorization for this appropriation comes from a bill which I think was introduced in the other body by the Senator who is the brother of our Speaker. A similar bill was introduced in the House by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, I believe, but in any event, the authorization bill was passed last year to provide for this $203,000 and the appropriation was made last year, as has been related here.

New, let us get clear just what this appropriation is for. I have found some confusion about that. Some people have thought that this is county-agent work that had something particular to do with the Triple A or soil conservation or parity payments or something of that sort. That is not the case. This appropriation is to maintain in these 21 States that have already been mentioned by the gentleman from Washington, the work of the regular county farm agent, the man in the county to whom the farmers go for consultation on epidemics among the horses or epidemics among the cattle, or advice as to seeds and as to proper crops to grow—the regular, old-line, old-fashioned county agent. Many of you will talk to 4–H Clubs of boys and girls this summer and praise their work. You better vote for it here. That is what this money is for. It is not some sudden, new-fangled agency at all. It is the regular, old-line, county-agent work, along with the Home Extension Service, the 4–H Club work for the boys and girls, the preparation of exhibits for State and county fairs.

The 21 States already mentioned are in a predicament, because the basis of apportionment for the extension-service law was changed from what it used to be. That change in the basis of apportioning county-extension funds did result in increasing to the States, other than these 21 States, a total of $529,000, giving them an increase in their work of this type. The amendment proposed takes nothing from them, it simply provides for the States who lost an amount equal to what they lost.

This appropriation does come up here with a budget estimate. We are not violating any of the principles enunciated by the gentleman from Virginia, in approving this item. This is a budgeted item. It came before us in the budget in the House. For some reason the subcommittee did not see fit to include it, but the Senate did. So it comes before us as a budget item. It is a very small amount for any 1 State, but without it 21 States will have to eliminate some of their county agents and some of their home extension work. It simply restores to these 21 States a total of $203,000. This would be less than $10,000 a State if it were distributed equally. Some of the States get a little more than some of the others, but it is important to all of them. The problem of which county agents to eliminate, of what work, the regular, old-line, county agent work, will be a severe one for those States if this budget item is not approved. Consequently, I hope you vote for the preferential motion offered by the gentleman from Washington to recede and concur.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. JENSEN. Is it not a fact that the farmers are becoming more and more dependent on the advice of the county agents and that they are giving them the kind of cooperation and the kind of experienced advice that the farmers need today, because farming has become very scientific in its ramifications, and more so than ever before?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. That is true. I think this money multiplies in its benefits.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I am impressed by the gentleman's statement that the amount is only $203,000 and all the States are benefited by it. I think the money is badly needed and I hope the views expressed by the gentleman prevail and that the motion to recede and concur is adopted.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I thank the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. HOPE. My State is not affected in the least by this proposal, but I simply want to say to the gentleman that I know at the time the Committee on Agriculture revised the basic law under which payments are now being made, that there was no intention of cutting down any State, and after going into the entire situation the Committee on Agriculture passed the amendment to which the gentleman referred a while ago, with the thought in mind of making it possible that no State would lose any funds that it had previously received.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Yes; I am sure the Committee on Agriculture went into the matter carefully when it authorized this appropriation to correct the situation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER].

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] is always interesting when he unsheathes his shining sword in the interest of economy, but there is a difference in the times when the gentleman undertakes to present his arguments to the House. On the passage of the Labor-Federal Security Agency bill, which included appropriations for the Civilian Conservation Corps, the gentleman made a beautiful and what doubtless would have been an effective speech, had it been made before the House voted on the item, but on that occasion he deferred his argument to the House until after the House had already approved the $50,000,000 increase. It may be interesting to note in that connection that the gentleman in the Committee on Appropriations was himself interested in bringing about the $50,000,000 increase to be deducted from W. P. A. funds. But he does not delay his attack when it is a matter of interest to the agriculture of the country. When it is a question of economizing at the expense of the American farmer, the gentleman never even waits until the item he attacks is under consideration, but he comes out when the House is engaged in the consideration of another item, and makes an appeal for economy and for the House to measure up to its responsibilities in connection with the financial program of the Government.

I feel just as much interested in economy as the gentleman from Virginia. I think there is probably no Member of this House who has voted against more appropriations in the aggregate amount during the last 8 years than I have done, but what I object to is undertaking to take all of our economy out of the hide of the American farmer, which is what you propose to do if you undertake to defeat all of these amendments which are being insisted on by the Senate. You may adopt every amendment which is here in dispute, and still the agricultural appropriation bill for 1941 will be over $100,000,000 below the agricultural bill for 1940.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. Yes.

Mr. SOUTH. And would not the aggregate be far below the appropriations of last year?

Mr. TARVER. I have just stated that the amount would be something over $100,000,000 below the appropriations for the present fiscal year, which I assume is what the gentleman means by mentioning the appropriation made last year.

With reference to this particular item of $203,000, I did not think it ought to be put in the bill. I did not think the Congress ought to have passed a law which would provide for any other basis of distribution of these extension funds except that provided in the Bankhead-Jones Act, but we are faced here with a situation where the Senate, which is a body coordinate with us in the handling of legislation and entitled to equal consideration, is firmly fixed on the making of this appropriation, which was made last year, in order that these 21 States may not sustain any loss in the distribution of these extension funds. I do not agree with the gentleman from Kansas that the Senators are irresponsible, that they are endeavoring to loot the Treasury of the United States, that they have no idea of their responsibility as representatives of their States in the Senate of the United States, which I understood was substantially the argument that he advanced.

The gentlemen who served on the conference committee on this bill representing the Senate side were gentlemen in whose integrity and in whose ability I have the highest confidence, and they adopted no arbitrary position. They yielded on scores and scores of amendments. They are simply insisting on some recognition of their position with regard to some of these matters that are in dispute. So far as I am concerned, after we have argued these matters over with them for a month—and some of these items involve only $10,000, mere chicken feed when you take into consideration the total amount of this bill—after having gone through with a somewhat grueling procedure, having ironed out most of the differences existing between the House and the Senate, I am prepared against my own viewpoint in some cases as to what ought to be done, to give some consideration to their viewpoint, and, in order to effect an agreement on this bill between the two Houses I think we must give some consideration to the views of the Senate; and for that reason I intend to vote with the gentleman from Washington to recede and concur in this amendment of $203,000 affecting the interests of 21 States.

I do not desire to get into any controversy with any of the members of the conference committee. It has already been pointed out that the entire eight members of the House subcommittee did not serve on the conference. Only three of us served on the conference. Something has been said with reference to some conference of Members of the House concerning these amendments. I conferred with them. I made no agreement, but I gave those gentlemen the benefit of such information as I had with regard to these items which are in dispute, and I have no apology to offer. Very often, in the course of the House-Senate conference, the chairman of our House conferees would state that he would not act upon some matter until the next meeting, because he had to go off and confer with his people. Who his people may have been I do not know, but after this conference report was sent to the House with these amendments in dispute, I did not have any objection to conferring with my people. My people are the Members of this House who represent the interests of agricultural districts in this country, with whom I am cooperating on this bill to the best of my ability. I want this bill to be a bill which will do all that we can do in the interest of agriculture. When we come to the point where we are willing to economize—and I hope that time will come at no distant date—when we must cut down radically in the expenses of the Government, I hope that we will cut down all along the line.

I am willing to go with the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. WOODRUM, or Mister Anybody else, just as far as most men would go in an effort to do that and to bring about a balancing of the Budget, but I am not willing to undertake to effect some minor economies at the expense of the agricultural population of this country and then contend to our people that we are trying to do something in the interest of balancing the Budget and not going above the debt limit.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. MAY. I grew up on a farm and am always in sympathy with the farmer, but I am concerned about the statement made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] to the effect that we are going to be beyond the debt limit several million dollars at the end of this session. The gentleman from Georgia is a prominent member of the Appropriations Committee and knows about these things. If that is correct and we have to refuse payment when the time comes, what is going to be the effect of it?

Mr. TARVER. I get the gentleman's point. I think the gentleman from Virginia is undertaking a prophecy concerning what may be done by the Congress during the remainder of this session. Certainly this parity-payment item about which he talks so much does not materially involve the debt limit, so far as the next fiscal year is concerned. Why? Because you understand we make the appropriation this year and the money in the main is not to be expended until the fiscal year of 1942. So there is no justification whatever for the insistence here made that the parity payment of $212,000,000 involves going above the debt limit. The debt limit is not exceeded when you make appropriations. The debt limit is exceeded when you borrow to spend the money, and whenever the Treasury of the United States has paid out all the money that it can without borrowing beyond the $45,000,000,000 debt limit it will cease to pay out money, without regard to what appropriations may have been made by the Congress, and until the money appropriated is due to be paid out the question of exceeding the debt limit is not involved. So parity payments in this bill will not materially affect the debt limit during the next fiscal year.

Mr. Speaker, I have undertaken to present as frankly as I could my views in a general way. The discussion on this amendment has been largely a general discussion of all the issues which are now pending, rather than on the amendment itself.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FULMER. It might be possible for the gentleman to answer the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY] that if we would just delay building two or three of these big ships we might be able to take care of agriculture and take up the shipbuilding just a little later.

Mr. TARVER. I am sorry I am unable to agree with my colleague from South Carolina that that argument is sound. I believe it is incumbent upon this Congress to provide for the adequate defense of the American people. I do not think it is of any logical consequence for a Member to say that you ought to stop building a battleship that will cost $100,000,000 in order to spend $100,000,000 somewhere else. We have to spend whatever money is necessary for the construction of battleships for the adequate military defense of this country, especially in times like these; but at the same time I do not believe you are justified in only effectively raising the question of economy when you get to a bill which affects the interests of the agricultural people of this country. You have spent $800,000,000—or you have obligated the credit of the United States to that amount—to relieve slum conditions in the cities. You have a bill pending which proposes to double that amount. Why not do something for the American farmer? Why cut his bill more than $300,000,000 below what his bill was for the present fiscal year? You have not made such economies in any other bill. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. CUMMINGS].

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, I want to speak especially about this item of $203,000. I cannot understand why when any legislation that pertains to agriculture comes up, people immediately get anxious about saving the Nation and not spending. The truth is that this money was approved by the Bureau of the Budget. The truth is that if this appropriation is not made we will lose 75 county agents and 16 county workers, or a total of 91 people, who are interested in bettering agricultural conditions in the United States. We are entitled to it. It is not an increase. Some of these States that are represented by gentlemen who are harping so much about economy have a great increase. My State is interested to the extent of $15,000. Twenty-one States are interested to the extent of this $203,000. You are not going to save the Nation by taking $203,000 away from people who are entitled to it. You are not going to save this country by cutting $203,000 off the educational forces of this country. If it is necessary to appropriate more money to pay this national debt and take care of financial affairs I am perfectly willing to do it. If you think it is advisable to increase the income tax on the lower brackets—that is where I belong—I am perfectly willing to do that, but I am strenuously opposed at this time to taking this $203,000 from 21 States while the other States of the Union get a material increase.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I yield.

Mr. HORTON. Does the gentleman know that Wyoming is in the same fix that Colorado is, that we lost 17 percent of our total fund for extension work? Under this bill unless we get the additional appropriation we get only $46,000 to carry on our work. We are harder hit than any other State in the Union.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I know it. That is why I looked at the gentleman. I thought maybe he would ask me a question.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LAMBERTSON].

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to answer my colleagues, the gentleman from Washington and the gentleman from Georgia, who complained about the conference committee, one a member of it and one a member of the subcommittee.

All that the conference committee is doing is to maintain the attitude of the subcommittee, of the whole committee, and of the House after the House had had time to discuss it. That is the attitude of the conference committee. We are maintaining the attitude of the eight Members who passed on it, of the whole Committee on Appropriations, which passed on it, and of the House, which passed on it. There is not much remaining to explain. We are maintaining the attitude of the House; that is all.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT].

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, anything which cripples the wealth-producing abilities of the American farmer is gross extravagance and not economy. Simply to vote against a service under the guise of economy without analyzing the value of the service may be just as foolhardy and injudicious as trying to practice economy by abolishing the fire department of a city or trying to pay homage to economy by jeopardizing millions of dollars of property by chopping off a few thousand dollars required for police protection. Gentlemen, this Congress must practice wise and effective economy, but we must at the same time retain our sense of discrimination as to when to vote for appropriations and when to vote against them. It is quite possible that some votes in disapproval of appropriations may be more reckless and extravagant than votes in favor of them.

As I indicated by my observations a few minutes ago, when the gentleman from Washington, Congressman LEAVY, yielded to me, the money necessary to continue county-agent services in America is an investment in thrift and not a manifestation of extravagance. When farmers are helped to become self-sustaining through cooperation of these county agents, we are preventing future demands for Government appropriations to enable the farming industry to survive.

You have heard the gentleman from Washington, Congressman LEAVY, and the gentleman from Georgia, Congressman TARVER, point out the value of this extension service, and my colleague from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] has emphasized the fact that we are not asking for an increased appropriation but merely for the ratification of a Budget item essential if 21 of our sovereign States are not to be discriminated against in the matter of this extension service. I want to take this time to point out to you that the appropriation of this $203,000 now may well be the means of saving the Government much larger appropriations at a later date.

To those of you not familiar with the farming region I want to point out that the work of county agents and home-demonstration agents is highly varied and mighty helpful. Through the assistance of those agents farmers are aided in keeping abreast of the most modern methods of weed control, they are given data on the prevention and care of stock diseases, they are provided with the most up-to-date information on insect control, and in countless other ways these agents are of service to our farmers in meeting the innumerable problems confronting the modern farmer.

You have all heard the ancient adage, "A stitch in time saves nine." So, too, good friends, such a "stitch" as this small appropriation to continue the work of these county agents may well save the "nine stitches" which might otherwise have to be provided by this Government in appropriations for eradication of noxious weeds, for curtailing stock diseases, and in annual appropriations to meet the menace of insect plagues. Helping the farmer to help himself is sound Government economy, and this appropriation is precisely for that purpose.

Mr. Speaker, I wish I had more time to elaborate on this item, as well as to speak on several of the other amendments which are in disagreement in this conference report. But time is limited and there are many who want to speak. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] was good enough to grant me this opportunity to speak, and since it is doubtful whether I shall have access to the floor again during discussion of these amendments I want once again to call your attention to the fact that the farm problem remains America's No. 1 economic problem and that prosperity for the rest of the country awaits the restoration of prosperity for the farmer. Only as the producer of new wealth in this country is fairly and fully paid will labor and industry, business, manufacturing, and banking again enjoy economic prosperity.

In conclusion I would like to call your attention again to my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, starting on page 2488, on the subject of fair treatment for American farmers. I hope you will read these remarks before voting on the parity amendment, and I especially recommend its consideration to those of you representing the city districts of this country. Let us all remember that aiding the farmer serves all America and is not just a gesture to one segment of our society. Give our domestic farmers a fair price for a full crop and a parity price for raw materials consumed domestically and the wave of prosperity starting from the Farm Belt will roll up to bring employment, profit, and happiness to the entire country.

Mr. Speaker, and colleagues, I hope the Senate amendment to provide this $203,000 needed for our extension service is supported by this House. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN], 3 minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I ask the House this question: Are we appropriating money to aid the farmer or to aid some of those who want to finance their political fortunes by taking a part of this money and using it for that purpose?

I would like you to get the farmer's view on that. Let me read you a few letters from a farmer who is a member of one of the A. A. A. township committees.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman let me answer the question he asked?

Mr. HOFFMAN. The gentleman can answer it in the RECORD tomorrow.

This letter was written to me on April 4 by a resident of the county in which I have lived for 40 years:

APRIL 4, 1940.

DEAR MR. HOFFMAN: I am one of the A. A. A. committeemen of ——— township.

About March 1 a meeting was called of all the committeemen of the county, at a cost of over $300, which comes out of the farmers' soil checks, to boost a dinner to celebrate the anniversary of the A. A. A.

I am glad to say that the committeemen refused to act.

These meetings were called all over the country.

To that I replied, asking him as to where he got the information that it would cost $300 for the county dinner, and whether he had any idea how that expense was met. To that letter he replied as follows:

APRIL 18, 1940.

DEAR MR. HOFFMAN: In reply to your letter of April 15.

A meeting of the community committeemen was called, or 72 of them, at $4.50 a day each, to push the dinner.

There were tickets printed with form to fill in with purchaser's name and address. Then a church or society could put on the dinner; then all the tickets sold were to be turned in, so that whoever was behind the affair would have the names and addresses of all those attending.

The pay to the committee members is charged to administration of the farm program, so comes out of the farmers' soil checks.

We were to get someone else to push the dinners so that our hands wouldn't show.

Note the last sentence of this letter:

We were to get someone else to push the dinners so that our hands wouldn't show.

If the program is a worthy one, if committeemen paid out of Federal funds were to push it, why the secrecy? The natural course would be for anyone who had any part in a program which was worthy, to be proud of his participation therein.

On April 29 the farmer wrote me again, as follows:

APRIL 29, 1940.

Mr. CLARE E. HOFFMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

In reply to your letter of April 22, a meeting was called at Allegan, and we were not notified what it was for. When we were wanted in Allegan, Mr. ———, the chairman of the township committee, was notified and he notified me, and if he knew what was wanted he always said he did not know what they wanted us for, and when the meeting was called to order we were told about the dinner plans and asked to cooperate in boosting it. I said in a former letter that there were 72 committeemen there. I assumed that they were all there as there are 72 committeemen in the county, and nearly all of us want the $4.50 per. I was at the meeting and was paid $4.50. And now for the speech Wallace made at St. Paul. I was asked to go but did not. I suppose all of the committeemen were asked and I learned this morning that 45 of the Allegan committee wet. We were offered 2 days' pay, of $9 each, for that.

I don't think that Mr. ———, our county chairman, was guilty on the dinner proposition, as I heard that Mr. Art Nour, a district man, complained to him about Allegan's expense in checking the farms, that Mr. ——— retorted that Mr. Nour called a political meeting at a cost of over $300.

I believe I am justified in the belief that all of the committee received pay for attending the meeting to discuss the dinner.

Very truly yours.

Then I wrote again, inquiring as to the meeting to hear Wallace. The reply to that letter is as follows:

MAY 5, 1940.

CLARE E. HOFFMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

In reply to your letter of May 1, 1940.

The 45 committeemen went to St. Paul to hear Wallace, and the $9 each that they were paid comes out of the farmers' checks, as that $405 is added to the administration expense, so takes a larger percentage of the participating farmers' checks.

I do not know Art Nour's address, and do not like to ask, as I would like to continue on this job.

I believe Mr. Nour called the meeting at the direction of the State committee. If I can learn Mr. Nour's address, will let you know.

Very truly yours.

The May 2, 1940, issue of the Decatur Republican, Van Buren County, Mich., contains these statements:

TWENTY THOUSAND FARMERS AT MEETING IN ST. PAUL

On Friday, April 26, farmers who are committeemen working on the soils-conservation program in Michigan left by special train to attend a meeting held in St. Paul, Minn., for the north-central region of the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

The train, starting from Lansing and running over the Grand Trunk Railroad, carried over 700 committeemen to this meeting.

Transfer service was furnished by the railroad at Chicago, and the trip was completed over the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul.

Eighteen States were represented at this meeting, and it was announced that over 20,000 farmers were in attendance, the largest all-farmer group ever assembled in the United States.

Mr. Arthur B. Nower, former county chairman of the Van Buren County A. C. A. and now working on the State board as supervisor over 6 counties, was credited with an attendance of 188 farmer committeemen from his district. Allegan County was first in attendance with 45, and Van Buren second with 36 attending.

The principal speaker was Secretary of Agriculture, Hon. Henry Wallace, of Washington, D. C., and his speech dealt with the topics of farm mortgages and farm credit as well as the Triple A farm program. It met with the approval of the vast assembly, if you consider the applause given. This speech went out over the N. B. C. network and was probably heard by several million people.

Short speeches were given by three dirt farmers, one from Michigan, one from Ohio, and one from Kansas, and dealt with farm mortgages as they affected them personally and other farmers in their neighborhoods. These talks were very interesting.

Those who attended from Michigan assembled at Lansing, Battle Creek, and Cassopolis to board the train, and some farmers drove a distance of 140 miles by automobile to reach these starting points. Special police service was furnished by the railroad to watch automobiles parked on railroad grounds until the return of the train.

I have a letter from Secretary Wallace, in which he advises me, among other things, that—

No compensation was paid to county agents, county committeemen, nor any persons connected with the agricultural program for assisting in arranging for the meetings commemorating this anniversary.

He also states that at the meeting, which was called early in March, the committeemen talked on 403's. Form NCR 403 is officially titled "Farm Plan for Participation in the 1940 Program." He states that at this meeting the committeemen took up the minutes of the meeting, parity payments, everything that a farm reporter could take up.

He also reports that Clarence Swanebeck, of the Michigan State A. A. A. office, supplied the following information:

At this meeting they had a farmer, Walter Whiteman, Fennville, route 2, Republican by politics, and chairman of the dinner committee, appear at 10 a. m. Mr. Whiteman left at 10:25. Took about 25 minutes of the time telling about what he was planning to do about the dinners in that county.

His representative then stated:

They went on with the regular work the rest of the day. These men went out and worked on 403's.

Secretary Wallace also stated that the committeemen were elected by their neighbors to administer the program locally.

They work only part time and their pay comes from the farmer payments allotted to their respective counties.

What the Secretary did not tell me and what I am disposed to learn, if possible, is why committeemen should be paid to attend a meeting called, as they were advised at least, to promote dinners? And why should they be offered $4.50 a day to go to St. Paul to hear Secretary Wallace speak?

The money which is appropriated by this Congress to aid the farmers, the majority of the Members of Congress, I am quite sure, expected would be paid to the farmers for soil conservation or for other things outlined in the program. Yet here we have, under the administration of the Secretary of Agriculture, payments being made for the promotion of dinners, to induce men to go to a distant city to hear the Secretary speak, and the expenses or per diem of the few paid out of the total fund, thus lessening the payments that can be made to all other farmers.

I am asking the Secretary of Agriculture how much of the money which was appropriated by Congress was expended to induce an attendance at his St. Paul meeting and his reply will be awaited with interest.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, we have gone rather far afield from the matter that is pending before the House at the present time. There is on the desk a preferential motion to concur in the Senate action; namely, to restore $203,000 to this bill which makes provision for the county agents in 21 States. I am opposed to the preferential motion, and I hope it will be voted down. It reminds me of a whimsical tailor friend of mine who used to hit everyone over the back with a ruler and say, "Everything according to rule." Now, then, this matter is being allocated according to rule; $18,000,000 for extension work under the Smith-Lever Act, under the Capper-Ketcham Act, and under the Jones-Bankhead Act. We used to allocate $20,000 to each State and Territory, and then the balance was allocated on the basis of rural population. They finally changed the formula and instead of allocating on the basis of rural population, which includes the small towns, it is allocated on the basis of farm population, which excludes those towns and, as a result, you have a change because of the application of this formula. If the Congress every year is going to provide a gratuity and torpedo its own enactments, irrespective of the existence of a general authorization which gives the Secretary of Agriculture the power to allocate within his own discretion $300,000, we might just as well throw the whole thing into the Potomac River. The formula is there. The allocation has been made according to the formula, and if it falls with greater impact on one State than on another, the fact of the matter is it is nothing more than an articulation of the interest and of the desire which was promulgated by the Congress itself.

That is the whole story, and because of that it occurs to me that we ought to vote down the preferential motion now pending on the desk.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOPE. Is it not true that Congress, recognizing the inequities of the formula which took away from some States the amount which they had been receiving, passed legislation which now authorizes this appropriation?

Mr. DIRKSEN. If Congress had that specific thing in mind they would have mandated the Secretary of Agriculture to do that specific thing. Instead of that they just passed a general open-ended authorization act giving him the discretion to do that.

Mr. HORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. HORTON. In the changing of the method I wonder if the Congress knows that Wyoming has a lot of little villages, the same as they do in France, particularly in the western part of the State, where the Mormons live. They live in the villages and go out 10 or 15 miles every morning to their farms and ranches and carry on their farming operations. They are just as much ranchers and just as much farmers as if they live on the farm. By this act you are beating my State out of 17 percent of the Extension Service that they have had, and I may say we are only getting $46,000 for this work.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Maybe they had too many in the first place.

Mr. HORTON. No; they did not have enough.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the balance of the time.

Mr. Speaker, one of the unhappiest features of service on a House committee is the necessity of opposing propositions in which our colleagues are interested. It would be so much easier for us to go along and agree amiably to everything our colleagues wish. We would like to have their friendship, and if we could follow our preferences we would put into this bill every item which our colleagues requested. And when we got through the bill would take every cent in the National Treasury, and more.

But we have to draw the line somewhere, and reluctantly we draw it at the point of merit. After admitting everything we dare, and stretching the point as far as possible on much of that, there are always some requests to which we cannot agree if we are to maintain any semblance of consistency, for Members never get through asking. The pending amendment is an example. Those who are asking for this appropriation are asking for something that is not justly due them under the law. When we changed the law to provide for allotment to States on a basis of farm population—which includes only those living on farms and actually engaged in farming; to rural population, including towns and cities and including persons who could not by the widest stretch of the imagination be classified as farmers—the change was universally approved. Everybody agreed that if this was to assist farmers no one but farmers should be counted in making the allocation. We are sorry these States do not have more farmers. That is not our fault. And when they ask this $203,000 they are asking a gratuity at the expense of the other States. They are asking, in effect, to be put on W. P. A., and the rest of the States pay the bill.

But the situation is even more flagrant than that. They have all along acknowledged that it was a gratuity, but they have contended that it was in lieu of funds they lost when the Jones-Bankhead Act was passed. There is no ground for any such contention. They did not lose by the change. Instead the 21 States gained $89,000.

In 1935, when this act was passed to provide appropriations in lieu of unauthorized funds which all the States had received under the supplementary Smith-Lever Act, additional cooperative and A. A. A. allotments, it was arranged to reduce the unauthorized funds at the rate of 25 percent each of the 4 years during which the Bankhead-Jones Act was adding to the funds at the rate of $1,000,000 annually. But through delay in getting the agreement in operation, the States received both the 25 percent and the $1,000,000 the first year when they should have had only the Bankhead-Jones allotment. In other words, for that 1 year of transition they got a windfall of the 25 percent of the old funds. Now they insist on taking that year as a basis when the actual basis is 1935. This overlapping of appropriations is shown in the following table:

Total amounts received before and after the Bankhead-Jones Act went into effect

	1935	1936	1941
Smith-Lever (permanent):
Flat ($10,000 each)	$210,000	$210,000	$210,000
Rural population	676,760	676,760	676,760
Capper-Ketcham:
Flat ($20,000 each)	420,000	420,000	420,000
Rural population	85,855	85,855	85,855
Smith-Lever supplemental: Rural population	271,297	271,297	----------
Additional cooperative (discretionary)	299,200	404,550	----------
Agricultural Adjustment Administration allotments (discretionary)	1,189,357	----------	----------
Bankhead-Jones:
Flat ($20,000 each)	----------	420,000	420,000
Farm population	----------	1,235,520	1,522,291
Total	----------	1,655,520	1,942,291
Farmer's cooperative demonstration	89,500	62,195	----------
Total	3,235,969	3,780,177	3,328,906

Fifty-thousand-dollar flat sum distribution to each State: Of all extension funds there is distributed to each State and Territory an equal sum of $50,000, the balance being distributed to some formula.

Total flat sum distribution to all States and Territories	$2,500,000
Total flat sum distribution to the 21 States	1,050,000
If the $2,500,000 were distributed on rural population basis, the 21 States would receive but	420,575
Difference, representing advantage already enjoyed by the 21 States over the others	629,425

The following table shows the variation under each item as between the year 1935 before the Bankhead-Jones law became effective and the year 1941 for which this, the pending bill, makes provision:

Extension funds allotted to the 21 States from all funds, 1935 and 1941 (does not include $203,000 in Senate amendment No. 6)

	1935	1941	1941 compared with 1935 (+ or −)
Smith-Lever, permanent	$886,760	$886,760	----------
Capper-Ketcham	505,855	505,855	----------
Capper-Ketcham supplemental	271,297	----------	−$271,297
Additional cooperative ($1,000,000 discretionary fund)	302,200	----------	−302,200
Farmers' cooperative demonstration	89,500	----------	−89,500
Agricultural Adjustment Administration allotments	1,189,357	----------	−1,189,357
Bankhead-Jones Act	----------	1,942,291	+1,942,291
Total	3,244,969	3,334,906	+89,937

It will be observed from this table that the 21 States, instead of losing $203,000, as has been contended, actually gain $89,937. If we now agree to this amendment, they will receive a total additional sum of $292,000 above the quota allotted to the other States.

Now permit me to take up another matter. The statement was made during debate that if all Senate amendments were agreed to, the bill would still be under the amount appropriated for the current year. That statement fails to take into consideration three items which must be included in a comparison of the 2 years. First, the $60,000,000 appropriated to cover the deficit in soil-conservation payments which the Senate by agreement with the House subtracted from the 357 and 369 bills. Second, the appropriation of $40,000,000 for rural electrification, which was provided for by direct appropriation last year and which is this year provided for by a mandatory authorization to borrow from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. As that adds by $40,000,000 to the national debt, it must be included in the comparison. Third, in the same way, the Senate amendments shift an appropriation of $50,000,000 for farm tenancy to the R. F. C., and that must be counted in making the comparison. These three items total $150,000,000, which when added to the $922,911,213 carried in the bill as it passed the Senate, would bring the total up to $1,072,911,213, which would be not only $165,000,000 above the Budget estimate, but is more than $30,000,000 higher than the bill for 1940 and the highest agricultural appropriation bill ever passed by any nation in any period of history. I heartily approve most of the appropriations in the bill, but we should be reasonable enough and prudent enough when we are exceeding the debt limit to refrain from such unwarranted and unjust raids upon the Treasury as this $203,000,000 bonus to States which are not entitled to it. I trust the House will vote down this motion. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the preferential motion of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LEAVY] to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CANNON of Missouri) there were—ayes 81, noes 66.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present, and I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 200, nays 174, answered "present" 1, not voting 55, as follows:

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. STEAGALL. I voted "nay." I withdraw that vote and vote "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCLAUGHLIN). The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 8: On page 16, line 15, strike out "$13,578,918" and insert "$13,834,918."

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CANNON of Missouri moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 8 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment insert "$13,796,918."

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 12: On page 17, line 19, strike out "$14,353,918" and insert "$14,634,918."

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CANNON of Missouri moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 12 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$14,586,918."

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 13: On page 18, line 13, strike out "$26,236,451" and insert "$26,617,321."

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CANNON of Missouri moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 13 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment, insert "$26,519,386."

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HOBBS). The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 17: On page 22, line 17, strike out "$814,380" and insert "$824,380."

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I offer a preferential motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Cox moves that the House recede and concur in Senate amendment No. 17.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MASSINGALE].

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to discuss the amendment with regard to parity payments. I understand an amendment will be offered to provide for full parity payments on the articles carried in the original bill instead of an offer or a promise to pay 75 percent parity on those crops. I stand for that kind of an amendment.

What I shall have to say may not interest all of you, but it ought to be interesting to you. I hope I shall be able to give you my reasons why it should be interesting to you. We had just as well wake up to the fact that the farmer of America is in a precarious condition, worse, perhaps, than he has ever been in under the Crop Control Act under which we are trying to operate at this time. It is no wonder that this condition prevails. I have said it on the floor here before, and I want to repeat it now.

The reason the farmer is in the condition you find him today is because we are operating under a fallacious theory of farm law, and this condition is not to be unexpected.

In 1932 the Republican Party had as its platform program crop-control legislation. The Democrats at that time advocated cost of production for farm products. Of course, the Democrats won the election, and we proceeded to steal your platform, and we have tried to operate it with a kind of pseudo-Democratic Secretary of Agriculture. [Laughter and applause.] Now, what have we got? We have a welter of confusion that the farmer cannot understand and nobody else, in this Congress or elsewhere.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASSINGALE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOUSTON. Did we not steal the Secretary, too?

Mr. MASSINGALE. Yes; we took him. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I have advocated since I have been a Member of this Congress the principle of cost of production for those farm products grown in the United States and consumed in the United States; that is, the percentage of them necessary for consumption and use in the United States of America. This has not received the consideration of the House of Representatives, and I think that is the whole cause—of course, I would think that—of the dilemma confronting the American farmer.

Mr. Speaker, if the farm situation were not so desperate as to be tragic, it would be amusing to watch the proceedings in the House of Representatives when it comes to consider almost any kind of legislation. During the week that we wasted on the wage and hour bill, nearly every man that got up here to make a talk prefaced his statement with the remark that his talk was in the interest of the American farmer by raising somebody's wages in a factory shed. I have no objection to raising the wages of labor. I think labor is entitled to a good, living wage, but the farmer is certainly entitled to something, and you have not given it to him. You have been feeding him soporifics for the 6 years I have been in Congress.

Of course, there has been much good come to the farmer of the United States in the way of benefit payments, but that is not substantial legislation. That is not security for the American farmer. If you are going to do anything for him at all, let us be honest and frank about it, and this Congress owes it to the farmer to see the Committee on Agriculture and beg that committee or force that committee to bring out for consideration the cost-of-production bill which will give to the farmer parity payments on that portion of his crop produced and consumed in the United States.

If we had the cost-of-production bill we would not need this kind of plaster stuff. If we had that kind of legislation we would not have to bother about wages for workers. There would be work for the workers in America if the farmer was given the purchasing power with which to buy the products of the country, and the consumers could get money enough from their wages to pay for them.

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASSINGALE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PATRICK. I want to know whether, under the Hatch law, if we made parity payments, that would bring all the farmers under the Hatch Act.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I will refer you to the gentleman from Texas, the Honorable HATTON SUMNERS. [Laughter.]

Mr. PATRICK. That is a good reference.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Now, here is the practical attitude that this Congress is in. We promised, and solemnly promised, to pay the farmers of America at least parity prices for their products grown and consumed in this country, and now you are dodging it; and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] wants to dodge it on the ground that we ought to balance the Budget. Well, I do not care a continental about balancing the Budget before we first meet our obligations. We have got obligations to the farmers of this country. We have not met them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us get out of the position in which we find ourselves now. Let us first discharge our duty to the farming classes in the United States of America, and then we can talk about balancing the Budget if we want to, but do not take it out of the farmer. I do not believe in much of this stuff about balancing the Budget. I do not think very many men in this House really want to balance the Budget. I think they would prefer to stay and follow after this archaic money system that we have, balancing the Budget or not. It does not make any difference to them. Now, here is the exact attitude we are in——

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASSINGALE. Will the gentleman pardon me just a moment and let me proceed just a little further?

Here is the attitude we are in. We have about six and a half million farmers in the country. These farmers are depending on the Congress of the United States to carry out its promise to pay them parity.

They relied upon it when they planted their crops. You have not done it. Why have not you done it? This body is not a body of men that wants to repudiate a debt or avoid any kind of an obligation. You want to do your duty to the American farmer. I know you want to do it, but you are sidestepping it. It reminds me of a story I read, when I was a boy, of Sergeant Prentiss, a Maine boy, who moved down into the State of Mississippi when he was a lad. He moved down there and became a famous man as a lawyer and as an orator. He states in the book of his life that one time up there in Maine when he was going to school one of the boys acted up. The teacher could not find out who the bad actor was. So he just called in the whole schoolroom, and flogged every one of them. He did not know who was guilty. Prentiss went back to his desk, and he wrote these lines:

God to Abraham once said that for the sake of the righteous ten he would save two cities full of men,
But you contrariwise have done by flogging a dozen to punish one.

It is difficult to tell what the attitude of the House of Representatives is toward farm legislation. I cannot believe that it is the desire of this House to punish six and one-half million farmers of the United States because of any feeling that we may have in regard to the administration of the farm law or because it takes a huge sum of money to operate that law. We made the law. We wrote into the law the agreement to pay the farmers parity for their farm products if they would comply with the law. They have complied. We have not paid. To say now that we cannot pay because we have not balanced the Budget does not square accounts between Congress and the American farmer. Certainly the House of Representatives is not taking the position that it does not want to pay what they agreed to pay the farmers of the country, because they do not like the administration. We must not forget that this would be quite a blow to the already impoverished farmers of the Union, and we ought to go very slowly before we would even entertain the thought of not keeping our contract with them.

I think the proper thing to do, for every Member of this House who has not signed discharge petition No. 5, is to go and do it without delay and bring from the Agriculture Committee to the floor of the House, H. R. 2371, the bill providing for the payment to farmers of parity prices on all agricultural products included within the terms of the bill. If we should pass such a bill, there would be no necessity in the future for the appropriation of any money out of the Treasury of the United States for making parity payments. These payments are taken care of in a different manner in the bill itself.

In addition to that, the bill would obviate the necessity of hordes of employees standing guard over and around the farms of the United States to see whether or not a farmer is making compliance with the terms of the Agriculture Adjustment Act. I think one reason that has held Congress back from the enactment of a law similar to H. R. 2371 or S. 570, is that it would mean the dismissal of approximately 110,000 employees of the Department of Agriculture. It would cost a little money, but not much comparatively, to set up and into motion the machinery necessary to operate this proposed bill. The Secretary of Agriculture issues each month what is the parity price of each article mentioned in the bill, and there are forty-odd commodities covered by the bill. Then the only additional help the Secretary would need is to appoint persons who are authorized to buy the products of the farm from the farmer and to look out for the sale and exportation of the surplus or exportable percentages. This would not be difficult. The procedure would not be complicated. The farmer could understand it. It would practically double the crop income of every farmer in the United States, especially of the small-farm operator. According to Secretary Wallace himself, it would increase the national income of the farmer to approximately $15,000,000,000 a year, or about twice what he gets now. It would bring the entire national income to approximately a hundred billion dollars a year. It would increase payments into the national Treasury from increased incomes not only of farmers, but of practically every kind of industrial and mercantile business in the United States.

If we really want to balance the Budget there is no better way to do it than to double the national income of the country. It will then be quite an easy task, according to the economists, to balance the Budget because the revenues will multiply so rapidly when everybody is at work and drawing pay for it, and every farmer is getting such a price for his produce that he can live on it and pay his debts. When this condition arises the Budget balancing will be almost automatic. Let us show the farmers that we are going to try to redeem one promise that we made. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I dislike ever to take a position contrary to that taken by my devoted friend, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], but I hope my friends will feel friendly to the amendment which is proposed. Only $10,000 is involved. For the particular activity for which the money is provided, the House made an appropriation of $15,000, but when the bill went to the Senate that body added $10,000. It is that $10,000 that is now in question. This small appropriation was set up for the purpose of carrying on an activity in that area on the coast that extends from Virginia around to Texas, including all of the Southwestern States. In this territory there are large tracts of fertile forest lands from which the timber has been removed, and the only use to which it can be put is largely the grazing of cattle. The appropriation is for the development of a grass or in the interest of improving the cattle within this area. The $15,000 was written into the bill on the part of the House committee largely at the instance of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN]. North Carolina is not an important cattle State. However, they have a great deal of this cut-over land, and there is a prospect of the development of a considerable cattle industry in that State, and in all of the other States affected. This is a matter of great importance to the people living in this area, and I trust that my friends may find it possible to support the amendment, which will mean the setting up of a fund to carry on this important work. The sum in amount is insignificant. It is to be spread over the entire area, although for the first year the $10,000 will be expended within my State, because we happen to have an experimental station which is undertaking to carry on this type of work. It is not in my district, but is in the districts of my colleagues Mr. PETERSON and Mr. GIBBS, who are somewhat southeast of me, where most of the work will be done. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN], originated this proposal and is probably in a better position than any other to give you a picture which will correctly represent the situation as it exists. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I will endeavor to make a correct statement of this matter and call the especial attention of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] to this statement.

Before coming to the Appropriations Committee, for 2 years prior to that I asked the Department to look into the advisability of an investigation of beef cattle and related livestock problems in the cut-over areas of the Southeastern States extending from Virginia to Texas. The Secretary of Agriculture made a very strong recommendation to the Bureau of the Budget for $50,000 for that purpose, to be spent jointly by the Bureau of Animal Industry and the Forest Service, the purpose being for the Forest Service to try to develop a grass in that area which they have so successfully developed in the Western States.

The purpose of the investigation was not to ever hope to raise cattle for commercial purposes. The lands on which the investigation would be made are cut-over lands, not suitable for the raising of tobacco or of cotton. The purpose was to really feed the people, many of whom are in a deplorable condition in that particular area.

The Appropriations Committee very kindly gave $30,000 for this purpose and it was my understanding that the $30,000 would be spent in North Carolina at one of the experiment stations, and North Carolina also agreed to supplement that amount out of its own funds. So of course really most of what I asked for was passed by both bodies, but when the item went to the Senate, the Senate insisted upon an additional $20,000 to bring it up to the amount originally requested by the Secretary of Agriculture. That amount is found in amendment 17 which is now before us and in amendment 37, which will come up soon, and if agreed to this additional amount will be spent in Georgia, in the district of Mr. Cox.

I regret that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] did not see fit to move to concur in this very small item so that the State of Georgia, which is similarly situated, may have the benefit of this study and investigation, and for that reason I hope that the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] will be adopted, because it will so vitally affect his State, as well as the States in that section.

I think that is a fair statement of the situation from its beginning until now.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER].

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, gentlemen will find, if they have an opportunity to examine the hearings on page 1299 and the following pages of the House hearings, a full discussion of this subject matter by authorities from the two agencies affected, the Bureau of Animal Industry and the Forest Service.

You will note that they whole-heartedly approve the proposed expenditure of $25,000 under the jurisdiction of each of these organizations, for the purpose of carrying on this investigation, and express the opinion that such investigation will be of great benefit to the millions of people living on the cut-over forest lands in the Southeast.

I may say here that the purpose of this investigation is not to develop a cattle industry in competition with the cattle-raising areas of the country, but as indicated by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] to do something to enable the millions of people on the cut-over forest lands to make provision for their own needs for beef. In the event they are unable to do so, they will not be customers of the beef-raising sections of the country at all. They will simply go without sufficient beef.

It is an appropriation which in my judgment is amply justified. I doubt if this investigation could be conducted for the $15,000 under the jurisdiction of this Bureau, which was provided in the House bill and $15,000 under the jurisdiction of the Forest Service which has already been provided. These items are not in dispute. If it takes $25,000, and they say it will, under each Bureau to make the proper investigation, certainly it seems to me it would be good business to spend it rather than to spend an inadequate amount and have an incomplete and unsatisfactory investigation.

As to the place of the expenditure, I am not concerned. My information differs from that of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] with reference to where the expenditure is to be made, but I am not solely interested in that. I am interested in the question of whether or not something can be done at this very reasonable cost to aid the several million people whose interests are vitally involved.

So I sincerely hope that the House may see fit to recede and concur in the Senate amendment, which adds the small amount of $10,000.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. I will say that I read the report of the Bureau of Animal Industry of the results obtained in North Carolina by adding certain cheap fertilizer to these cut-over areas, and they are very encouraged at the increase which the cattle achieved on this grass that had been so treated in this experiment. I think it is a very worthy and worth-while investigation.

Mr. TARVER. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG].

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, this small item of $10,000 is an item of vast importance to a great area. I will not go into the details of its purpose, because they have already been discussed by the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from North Carolina. Suffice it to say that personally I have had some experience in the matter of what can be accomplished in the development of range grasses as well as in the use of certain minerals in areas where the mineral deficiency in the soil fails to produce grass which gives proper sustenance to livestock.

We all know that from the standpoint of production of original wealth somehow or other we have got to get it out of the ground. The moneys that are being appropriated here today are the reflected pyramided earnings from the original wealth which is produced from the soil by tilling it, produced from the soil by converting the surface production of untilled areas into wealth; and the only machinery known to man that can accomplish that purpose is livestock. We mine wealth from Mother Earth in the form of minerals and other things but thereafter men working in different lines of business and handling it, through their industrial achievement, develop the rest.

The pending amendment strikes at fortifying the very fountain, the source, from which the moneys appropriated in this and other bills come; and the small amount of $10,000 here utilized in the great southeastern area of the States referred to by these gentlemen will be utilized in an area which, with proper study, may well be developed to produce more wealth than heretofore has been produced elsewhere.

Today mineral deficiency defeats the purpose of the average individual, and in the area where I became acquainted with what could be done—and I am going to close with this statement, too—on those ranges where originally it required from 30 to 40 acres to support a cow brute, by the introduction of proper grass 2½ acres has been made sufficient to support one cow. On a ranch that I once managed, and where I started the work, and we paid for it, we got experts from the Department of Agriculture to work with us for the benefit of utilizing that range as a laboratory. There is already available a bulletin showing the work done in southwest Texas on the matter of mineral deficiencies, which were referred to by my friend the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON].

I assure the membership of this House that this $10,000 involved in this amendment may well be worth $10,000 multiplied many hundreds of thousands of times. This amendment should be agreed to. The $10,000 added to the $15,000 should be allowed. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back 1 minute.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURRAY].

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, parity is supposed to be equality. I am opposed to this amendment for the following reasons:

No. 1. This appropriation goes to only a few crops, at the most five, and probably the bulk of it to one crop, cotton. These crops represent only a little over one-third of the national farm income.

This is not parity or equality in any fair sense of the word. Cotton has had 45 percent of this money and it represents only one-tenth of the national farm income. Look it up and you will also find that one State has already had over one-eighth of the money appropriated, and that five States of the Union have had practically 40 percent of this money. Such appropriations are not parity, equality, justice, nor common sense.

No. 2. In addition to the fact that this money has been distributed to only a few of the crops, we also find that this money has also been distributed to the wrong people and not the real agricultural people of our country.

Big checks have gone to big corporation farmers, insurance companies, hobby farmers, banks, bankers, and land speculators. The more agricultural subsidies from the Treasury that go to the above groups the more "Okies" go down the road and will continue to go down the road. If such subsidies are to be appropriated, they should go to the real farm people of this country that live on, operate, and own their family-sized farms.

This is a good time to cut appropriations. We can cut them from a small pressure group and withhold these funds that are being distributed in large amounts to people and groups that have no justification in asking for subsidies that have really been appropriated for the rural people of our country.

We cannot expect to continue these cross-purpose schemes. We must include all of agriculture. Why continue to hire two men to cut wood to put kindling on the fire, and then hire three more to carry water to put the fire out? Let us have parity for all farmers and quit giving to the few at the expense of the many.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Is the gentleman opposed to this amendment to provide money for reseeding of cut-over land?

Mr. MURRAY. No; to parity payments.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON].

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, we have heard numerous Members this afternoon point out that the farm program has been a failure. This, however, is not the opinion of the farmers of this Nation. An overwhelming majority of the farmers of this Nation favor the existing farm program, and certainly they are not going to be tricked into giving up the farm program they have that has worked, for any hazy promise of something better in the future.

Everyone here favors soil conservation. This farm bill that has been so attacked today and on previous occasions instituted soil conservation in this Nation at a time when the resources of the Nation were being depleted at a very rapid rate. When you vote for this bill you vote for soil conservation.

There have been speeches made for parity. Every Member representing a farm district has plead his heart out for parity, and today the committee brings in a bill providing the funds to actually pay parity. The provisions of the present bill are not very far removed from the propositions that have been advocated in this House. Section 203 of the present bill provides:

> If and when appropriations are made therefor, the Secretary is authorized and directed to make payments to producers of corn, wheat, cotton, rice, and tobacco on their normal production of such commodities in amount which * * * will provide a return to such producers which is as nearly equal to parity prices as the funds so made available will permit.

Today if we reach the parity amendment we are going to demonstrate to the farmers that we are not constantly receding but we are approaching the goal that we set up to reach in the original farm bill, which is parity. When the committee which is bringing in this bill offers an amendment to provide for the payment of 100 percent of parity on the products included in the farm bill, we are making steady progress to solve the farm problem. As a member of the Committee on Agriculture I am not ashamed to defend the present farm program for the farmers of this Nation. It is their program and they are going to continue to advocate it.

Members have opposed the farm-tenancy provision here today. The gentleman from Illinois talked for 12 minutes, but he never mentioned farm tenancy. He spoke in opposition without once mentioning farm tenancy. He continued to point out the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, an organization created to take over existing mortgages on town property, and said that failures suffered by the H. O. L. C. would be the final result of the farm-tenancy program. No wonder he would not give us the figures on how farm tenancy so far has functioned. They are the best recommendation for the $50,000,000 appropriation that has been provided by the Senate. The truth of the matter is that in connection with 8,355 loans, averaging $5,000 per loan, 99.9 percent have made their payments. This program has been in operation for 3 years. Eight thousand three hundred and fifty-five loans have been made and over 99 percent of them have made their payments when due.

When 300,000 farm tenants have applied for ownership, how can this House, in fairness and in justice, say that we should drop a program that has functioned for 3 years 99 percent perfect, because mortgages have not been paid on town property? We all admit that farm values are low. What better time to buy a farm to operate than at a time when the purchaser actually gets his money's worth in the purchase of a farm? The farm committees have functioned well in buying the farms and in choosing the men to intrust with the loan. I heard the argument that because some 300,000 people applied for loans and only 13,000 at the end of this year will have loans, we ought therefore to kill the program because of those who were disappointed in their applications. I took the time and trouble to write to every disappointed applicant in my district, and I asked him the question, Would you like to see the whole program stopped because you were disappointed?

I wish I had time to read to the House of Representatives the answers those men sent in. They said, "No. We want to have the opportunity to work toward the goal of actually owning and operating our own farms." They pointed out the various reasons. Letter after letter would say: "I have livestock; I have machinery; but if I rent a farm I must put it into a cash crop. I cannot keep my livestock; I cannot keep my poultry; I cannot even keep an adequate number of milk cows because the landlord demands that the land be put into a cash crop so that I may pay a bigger cash-crop rent; but if I had the privilege of buying this farm"—and they are not talking about something that is hazy to them; they know of a particular farm that can be bought and one which is worth the money—"if I could buy this farm or that farm," and they always mention the location of it, "I could pay for it under the Bankhead-Jones Act at no more expense than I am now paying in actual rent for the place I am on." That is true, because he would be able to diversify his farming operations and pay back that money.

If we are going to stop farm tenancy, we cannot wait for all these panaceas, and none of them has yet been presented to the Committee on Agriculture that would take the place of the present farm program. We cannot wait until some dim, distant time to stop this trend of concentration of land into nonresident ownerships.

Mr. Speaker, I hope this House will vote to retain the farm-tenancy provision. The future of farming is in the hands of the family-sized farm. The House has a chance today to vote for parity prices and farmer-owned farms. I hope to God we do not let the farmer down.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LAMBERTSON].

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, most of the speeches that have been made on this amendment have been on other things than the one immediately before us, which is a matter involving $10,000 for a beef investigation or an experimentation in connection with beef feeding in the Southeast, in one or two States at the most. The House reluctantly provided $15,000 for this new venture. They went over to the Senate and got $10,000 more. The House did a pretty good job in allowing $15,000. It was by a close vote in the committee, but they went over to the Senate and got $10,000 more, which is never hard to do.

I think the House ought to sustain the committee even on this small item. This is just as reasonable as if I or some Member from Nebraska or the Dakotas asked for $10,000, $15,000, or $25,000 to try to cultivate a new kind of cotton that might grow up in the Northwest. It would be just as reasonable. The South has its particular functions that it is cut out for and it is doing a job down there. It has general appropriations for all these things, including extension work and so forth, but down there where cotton grows and tobacco business is prosperous they want to learn how to feed cattle better in competition with the rest of the country where cattle are being fed now, generally at a loss.

I do not think it is any more justifiable than to hand Kansas and Nebraska and the Dakotas a $25,000 appropriation to develop a new kind of cotton that will grow up there. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, this committee is the servant of the House. Under your instructions we carried this bill to the Senate. We did what we could to sustain the position of the House, to defend the bill as you directed us to defend it. We had to compromise. We went more than two-thirds of the way. We brought back here only a remnant, only a fragment of the items in disagreement. We do not believe they are justified. We submit it to you for your action.

This is a small item. It is outside the Budget. There is no Budget estimate for it. It is an expansion at a time when we should be retrenching. The bill before you is the only bill which has been passed up to this time in excess of a Budget estimate. Every other supply bill has passed under the Budget. If you want to increase this bill in the face of the conditions which confront us, you have the opportunity. As we bring in the bill, it would not be necessary to exceed the debt limit. If you add everything the Senate requests, you will have voted a bill that will exceed any bill of this kind ever passed in the annals of the American Congress. I trust that you will disagree to the amendment. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. McCORMACK). The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] that the House recede and concur in amendment No. 17.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Cox) there were—ayes 69, noes 68.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present, and object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and twenty-three Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 179, nays 182, answered "present" 1, not voting 68, as follows:

So the motion was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Steagall (for) with Mr. Luce (against).

Until further notice:

Mr. Burch with Mr. Wadsworth.
Mr. Randolph with Mr. Ditter.
Mr. Starnes of Alabama with Mr. Maas.
Mr. Weaver with Mr. Gilchrist.
Mr. Fries with Mr. Thomas of New Jersey.
Mr. Claypool with Mr. Grant of Indiana.
Mr. Durham with Mr. Tinkham.
Mr. Sweeney with Mr. Rich.
Mr. Martin of Illinois with Mr. Darrow.
Mr. Boehne with Mr. Harness.

Mr. Taylor with Mr. Buckley of New York.
Mr. Smith of West Virginia with Mr. Sabath.
Mr. Shannon with Mr. Sacks.
Mr. Merritt with Mr. Dunn.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, on this matter I am paired with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL]. If he were here he would vote "yea." I voted "nay." I withdraw my vote and ask to be recorded as being present.

Mr. GOODWIN changed his vote from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. LESINSKI, Mr. ROBINSON of Utah, Mr. HOOK, and Mr. MURDOCK of Utah changed their votes from "nay" to "yea."

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCCORMACK). Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania qualify?

Mr. RICH. I do not, Mr. Speaker.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri that the House insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to put in some tables and figures indicating the cost of distribution under the A. A. A.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING TOMORROW

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns tonight it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. tomorrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MCLEOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Civil Aeronautics Authority.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a short article by John T. Flynn, in today's Washington News.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN asked and was given permission to revise and extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address delivered by the Work Projects administrator in my district.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include an address delivered by J. Edgar Hoover in New York City on May 3.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of the managers on the part of the House to take up the agricultural appropriation tomorrow at the conclusion of the consideration of the conference report upon the transportation bill, and it is our expectation that that bill will be concluded between 2 and 3 o'clock.

THE TRANSPORTATION BILL

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute, and read a statement of D. B. Robinson, president of Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, the statement to which I refer is as follows:

STATEMENT OF D. B. ROBERTSON, PRESIDENT, BROTHERHOOD OF LOCOMOTIVE FIREMEN AND ENGINEMEN

I have just read a letter sent to members of the conference committee on S. 2009, by Judge R. V. Fletcher, general counsel for the Association of American Railroads.

The judge endeavors to convey the impression, first, that in an article in the monthly magazine of our brotherhood I endorsed the conference report; and, second, that the chiefs of the four transportation brotherhoods, the Switchmen's Union of North America, and the Order of Railroad Telegraphers, didn't know what they were doing when they asked Members of the House to recommit the conference report on S. 2009 with instructions to reinsert the consolidation section with proper safeguards for railroad employees.

Permit me to assure you that I have never, either directly or indirectly, endorsed the conference report in its present form; and may I also assure you that the railroad labor executives who favor recommital know exactly what they are doing. They are endeavoring to protect the vital interests of hundreds of thousands of railroad workers, and they believe that can best be done by recommitting the conference report with the instructions they have suggested.

Judge Fletcher says he has assurances that if the conference report is recommitted, S. 2009 will be permitted to die. That's an extraordinary statement and to my mind is a grave reflection on the members of the conference committee who, of course, would be the first to proclaim themselves the servants of the House and Senate and, therefore, willing to carry out in good faith any instructions given them. Furthermore, there is nothing unusual about referring a conference report back to a committee. It has been done scores of times, as those who are familiar with parliamentary procedure well know. In practically every instance, the conference committee has brought the legislation back to House and Senate and it has been passed. Why should Judge Fletcher predict any different result in this instance? The truth is, the learned judge is bluffing. He fears to discuss our amendment on its merits, because he knows he has a bad case. So he endeavors to frighten Members of the House.

May I add, that as president of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, I am not accustomed to having my views interpreted to Members of Congress by the chief counsel of the Association of American Railroads. In this instance, on behalf of my own brotherhood, and cooperating with the chief executives of the other organizations who agree with the stand I have taken, I have endeavored, temperately and accurately, to state why we believe the conference report should be recommitted. I am sure no Member of the House has found it difficult to understand our statement, and therefore it was not necessary for the chief counsel for the carriers to volunteer an interpretation.

May I call your attention to one other fact: Advices reaching my office, and coming from all sections of this country, indicate that the railroads are endeavoring to coerce employees into sending letters, telegrams, and petitions to Members of the House sustaining the position taken by the carriers. You will recall, of course, that testimony before congressional committees has revealed that the railroads maintain an organization which might very properly be described as a superlobby, which extends into every State and practically every city of importance. This organization is being used to drive these railroad employees into opposing their own best interests, just as Judge Fletcher is endeavoring to mislead the members of the conference committee concerning the attitude of the chief executives who favor recommitting the conference report.

ELECTION TO COMMITTEES

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 488

Resolved, That the following-named Members be and they are hereby elected members of the standing committee of the House of Representatives, to wit:

Flood Control: ALFRED J. ELLIOTT, of California.

Mines and Mining: JENNINGS RANDOLPH, of West Virginia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks, and to include a eulogy of the late Reverend Floyd Seaman, by his wife.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDMISTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks, and include an address made by Hon. Louis Johnson, Assistant Secretary of War, to the State Junior Chamber of Commerce of Clarksburg, W. Va.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix, and to include certain tables relating to various benefits in the conference report which we have been considering this afternoon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFITH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and to include a statement made by J. H. Morrison before the Committee on Ways and Means on H. R. 1.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend the remarks I made in the House this afternoon. Also, to extend my remarks in the Appendix in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a letter from the citizens of Los Angeles, and a clipping from the Washington Merry-Go-Round.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TRANSPORTATION BILL

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a suggestion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the Members of this body that the statement made a moment ago that the Board of Railroad Brotherhoods did not know what they were doing is a mistake. They do know what they are doing. They want the bill recommitted for the purpose of improvements according to their desires and their rights.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from the Montreal Gazette.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCCORMACK). Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

THE WHEELER-LEA BILL

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

[Mr. VAN ZANDT addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix of the RECORD.]

SPECIAL ORDER

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under special order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN] is entitled to recognition for 20 minutes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, owing to the lateness of the hour, I ask unanimous consent that I may have that same 20 minutes on next Tuesday, after the disposition of the business of the day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under special order of the House, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ALEXANDER] is entitled to recognition for 30 minutes.

THE WHEELER-LEA BILL—NORTHWEST HAS DISCRIMINATORY FREIGHT RATES

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, it is constantly asserted that it costs more for the northwest farmer to get his grain carried from his neighborhood railroad station to Duluth, the head of the Great Lakes, and still 4,544 miles from his market at Liverpool, than it does his Argentinian competitor to get it carried all the way from Buenos Aires to Liverpool, 7,178 miles. This statement has been frequently made in the Marine Journal and other sources which I shall quote today, and before the outbreak of war in Europe the accuracy of that statement was never questioned. Recently, however, I received a letter from Mr. R. V. Fletcher, vice president and general counsel of the Association of American Railroads, and as a result have asked a check-up on the statistics therein contained. Mr. Fletcher's letter to me follows:

ASSOCIATION OF AMERICAN RAILROADS,
Washington, D. C., March 4, 1940.

The Honorable JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 28, you addressed the Congress on that day, dealing, among other things, with railroad freight rates in comparison with ocean freight rates on commodities of a similar character. I hope you will acquit me of any impertinence in addressing this letter to you, calling attention to certain inaccuracies in your statement with respect to the freight-rate situation.

You state that the freight rate on grain for 400 miles in the northwestern section of the country amounts to 16 cents a bushel. Our check, however, indicates that the rate from Pembina, N. Dak., to Minneapolis, a distance of 402 miles, and to Duluth, a distance of 409 miles, is 12.6 cents. The rate from Devils Lake to Minneapolis, a distance of 418 miles, seems to be 12.6 cents. The rate from Pierre, S. Dak., to Minneapolis, a distance of 417 miles, is 13.2 cents. Possibly some cases might be found where special conditions would require a rate as high as 16 cents, but our tariff men advise that the current going rate into Minneapolis for the 400-mile distance is substantially less than 16 cents.

It should be remembered, too, that this basis of rates was fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission as a result of its decision in docket 17000, part 7 (205 I. C. C. 503), a decision rendered October 22, 1934. This proceeding resulted from the Hoch-Smith resolution, which required the Interstate Commerce Commission to study the rate structure and remove discriminations. The resolution also made it obligatory upon the Commission to make the lowest possible lawful rates on agricultural products.

Prior to this decision of the Commission, the rate on wheat for the distance mentioned was somewhat less than the rate fixed by the Commission as a result of the investigation. In some cases the rate was as low as 10.5 cents. It would seem to be clear therefore that the basis of rates now in effect on wheat in this territory is as low as can be lawfully maintained.

Coming now to so much of your address as deals with ocean rates, it is stated that one can now ship grain from Buenos Aires to Liverpool, a distance of 7,200 miles, for 13.5 cents a bushel, or about $5 per ton. Such rates may have been at one time in effect, but our inquiry at the Department of Commerce indicates that the rate from the Argentine to European ports is $20 a ton, four times as much as the rate you quote. There is also information to the effect that, in some cases, the rates from the River Plate to European ports amounts to $32 per ton.

You mention also the fact that the rate from Australia to Liverpool, a distance of some 15,000 miles, is about the same as the amount paid by farmers in the Northwest to ship by rail 400 miles. Our inquiry, however, indicates that this ocean rate is now about $25 per ton in neutral vessels and $13.75 in British vessels. A rate of 16 cents per bushel amounts to about $5.35 a ton. It is possible, of course, that these ocean rates have been affected by war conditions. It may be worth remembering, however, that when you compare rail rates with ocean rates you must bear in mind the violent fluctuations of these ocean rates, due to shortage of shipping facilities incident to a war of the present character.

With respect to so much of your address as deals with rates on coal, it is true that the all-rail rate on coal from the inner crescent, so-called, to Minneapolis is about $5.55 a ton, which is approximately the same as the rate you mention. However, Minneapolis can secure coal from the Pittsburgh group by rail and water for $3.93 per ton applicable to fine coal and $4.54½ per ton applicable to lump coal. The rates from southern Illinois, a very good coal field, to Minneapolis, are $3.90 on lump and $3.71 on fine. Coal can be obtained from the Springfield group of mines in Illinois for 30 cents less than the above. The rates from Peoria and northern Illinois fields are uniformly 35 cents less a ton than from southern Illinois.

I am not writing this letter in any critical spirit. I realize the desire of all Members of Congress to be accurate in matters of this sort. Representing, however, the railroads of the country, I did not think I should neglect the opportunity to give you correct information with respect to the rate situation.

Very truly yours,

R. V. FLETCHER,

Vice President and General Counsel, Association of American Railroads.

Now, as Al Smith would say, let us look at the record, first calling attention to the obvious fact that only pre-war prices are of any value. Unless the world expects to stay at war from now on, and to have the oceans infested with submarines bent on torpedoing every neutral, as well as enemy ship, prices that have been quoted since last summer for freight on the ocean have no value whatsoever, unless it be to show how expensive war can be to the whole world and how foolish we humans are to allow it. A very good source of information for ocean freight rates is Broomhall's Commercial Trade Year Book, from which we glean the following figures averaging for 6 years 13⅛ cents per bushel for:

	1933	1934	1935	1936	1937	1938
Buenos Aires to Liverpool, per ton:	s. d.	s. d.	s. d.	s. d.	s. d.	s. d.
January	16 9	16 0	14 9	17 0	31 9	25 0
July	16 0	15 6	15 9	17 6	32 0	25 0
Freight rate, in cents, per bushel	10½	10¼	10	11¼	20½	16
	Average of the above is 13⅛ cents
Sydney, Australia, to Liverpool, per ton:	s. d.	s. d.	s. d.	s. d.	s. d.	s. d.
January	28 0	24 0	24 9	27 6	43 9	39 0
July	23 6	24 6	25 0	27 9	46 3	33 0
Freight rate, in cents, per bushel	16.66	15.75	16.0	17.66	28.75	23.0
	Average of the above is 19.66 cents

The 1938 figures are based on weekly reports of Chamber of Shipping. We thus see that over a period of years the cost of moving grain by sea from Buenos Aires to channel ports will not vary much from 13½ cents per bushel, as asserted in my remarks of February 28, above referred to, and the distance is 7,200 miles between the two ports. Before war came to disrupt shipping on the high seas there was a yearly hejira of a fleet of superannuated sailing vessels leaving the ports of Australia for Europe. Taking into account the vagaries of wind, the distance covered via Cape Horn might be 15,000 miles. These ancient steel and iron square-riggers would average a cargo of 3,000 tons of grain, and the freight rate was usually close to $6 per ton. On the basis of a 60-pound bushel and a 2,240-pound ton, this is not far from 16 cents per bushel. This does not differ greatly from what is paid the steamers and motorships who sail a much shorter route.

When we consider railroad grain rates in this country we find some remarkable discrepancies. Suppose we take the various farm shipping points of Dakota just west of Minnesota. Here are the rates and the mileages of haul between a dozen shipping points and Duluth, the head of the Great Lakes:

Shipping point	Distance of haul	Rate per bushel
	Miles	Cents
Aberdeen	445	14.4
Astoria	400	13.2
Blunt	568	16.5
Lemmon	642	19.8
Mitchell	480	15.0
Mobridge	544	16.8
Murdo McKenzie	715	20.7
Pierre	598	16.8
Rapid City	765	21.6
Sioux Falls	480	13.5
Wessington Springs	562	15.3
Yankton	424	15.3

A scrutiny of the foregoing list shows that only grain shipped from Astoria is deposited at Duluth for as low a freight charge as grain shipped from Buenos Aires to Liverpool. In other words, the Dakota farmer's grain has cost as much or more to be delivered to water at the head of Lake Superior, where it is still 4,544 miles from Liverpool by the shortest possible route, as it costs, normally, the Argentinian farmer to get his grain hauled 7,200 miles, all the way from Buenos Aires or River Plate ports to that same Liverpool. So no matter what is done to the St. Lawrence River, and I hope something is done soon, even if it were dug as deep and wide as the Amazon, or the grain were carried for nothing, the United States farmer would still suffer under a handicap of several cents per bushel. The prohibitory freight charge is the freight charge by the railroads for carrying the grain to Duluth from the various shipping points enumerated. And what is true of these Dakota shipping points is just as true of other shipping points in other parts of our section of the country. No wonder the farmer is broke.

COMPARE WITH CANADA

Now the Canadian farmer does not suffer under any such heavy handicap since the Canadian Pacific Railroad charges about one-half the rates of the United States Northern Pacific in most instances. Suppose we take two examples from Senator WHEELER'S own state, Montana, and contrast their grain rates with the freight rates for grain on the Canadian Pacific Railroad for a similar distance of haul. Turner, Mont., is 884 miles from Duluth via the Great Northern Railroad and the grain-freight charge for the haul is $8.72 per 2,000-pound ton, or about 26 cents per bushel. From Billings, Mont., to Duluth is 900 miles by the Northern Pacific Railroad Co., and the grain-freight rate is $8.82 per ton, which is about 26½ cents per bushel. The ton-mile rate in both cases is close to 9.8 mills per ton-mile.

Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, is 904 miles from Port Arthur via the Canadian Pacific Railroad, and the grain-freight charge is but $4.40 per ton, which is about 13 cents per bushel, or closely 4.85 mills per ton-mile.

Is it any wonder that in the 9 years which elapsed between 1924 and 1933 the Canadian farmers exported 2,462,000,000 bushels of wheat? How serious freight overcharges actually are may be gathered from the simple statement that had all that wheat gone via Saskatoon to Port Arthur, the saving for the poor farmer over what he would have been obliged to pay if the railroad had been run by the United States Northern Pacific Railroad Co. would have been over $320,000,000. That is what a saving of 13 cents per bushel would mean for one such item of export alone. Naturally the question arises, Why cannot the Northern Pacific haul grain as cheaply as the Canadian Pacific Railroad? Strange to say, Senator WHEELER does not seem to be interested in finding an answer to that problem. Nevertheless it seems to me it is the one problem whose solution is vital to the United States farmer. To stay in the export business he must be free from excess-freight-charge handicaps. It would help a whole lot if the United States railroads would haul grain out West at the same rate they haul it between Buffalo and New York. The distance from Buffalo to New York is 436 miles, and the rail rate has been normally about 5 cents per bushel, which translates for 33⅓ bushels to the ton of 2,000 pounds into but 3.82 mills per ton-mile; even less than the Canadian rate. Oh, Interstate Commerce Commission, where art thou? Looking the other way? Consistency, where art thou?

Just contrast the rate per ton-mile that the I. C. C. has permitted the United States railroads to charge for grain shipped from those 12 shipping points previously enumerated with the rate which the 3 important railroads that cross New York State from Buffalo to New York City are willing to accept, and ponder over the wisdom of turning over waterway rates to such discriminating and all-wise overlords. I cited the grain rates from 12 different shipping points to Duluth. The average distance of haul is 552 miles for the 12 and the average freight charge for the 12 is 16.575 cents per bushel. On the basis of the 2,000-pound ton and 33⅓ bushels to the ton, these figures translate into 9.91 mills per ton-mile as the average for all grain shipments from these 12 Dakota shipping points. In other words—though, according to statistics here, a lot of our Northwest farmers are on relief—the I. C. C. permits the United States railroads to charge them 2.6 times as much per ton-mile to haul their grain as the New York Central, the Erie, the Lehigh Valley, the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western are content to charge when the grain reaches Buffalo. And I have already shown you what a serious matter that excess charge of several cents per bushel means in the export grain trade. It means its death.

Year after year the cry goes up, "Something must be done for the farmer," and the only solution so far reached seems to be to pauperize him by the gift of a dole or a subsidy in some form or other. We shut our eyes and suffer the I. C. C. to permit exorbitant freight rates on the railroads that haul his produce and then make it up to him with presents of hundreds of millions of dollars by various subterfuges. Such a method of procedure is not wise; it is not statesmanship; it is just plain stupid. God help the Nation if tomorrow in this House the waterways freight rates are put under the jurisdiction of the I. C. C. and all other freight rates are to be patterned after the railroad freight rates which these distinguished gentlemen have suffered to be inflicted on our western farmers. Justice, where art thou?

There is a solution to the problem of the western farmer, and it involves the full development and scientific utilization of our great arterial rivers—the Mississippi and the Missouri—without restrictions. The savings that will thus be effected and will permit a profitable export trade in grain will also save the domestic consumer millions. Recent research claims to have established that in the average dollar's cost of merchandise there is but 41 cents' cost of production, while 59 cents is eaten up by unscientific distribution. Be that as it may, European nations utilize their waterways to the limit and reserve their railways for fast freight. Grain is carried on our Great Lakes 1,000 miles for 2 cents per bushel. Grain can be carried down the Mississippi and Missouri at the same rate, but only with the finest and most up-to-date equipment for loading, transporting, and unloading, and with freedom from the paralyzing hand of bureaucracy. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, supplementing my remarks above, I ask permission to insert at this point in the RECORD the following letters and telegrams from various individuals and groups, which I have recently received, expressing opposition to the Wheeler-Lea transportation bill.

STILLWATER, MINN., May 8, 1940.

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ALEXANDER: In interest of the general public and river transportation, please vote against the Wheeler-Lea bill, S. 2009, as it now stands rewritten.

Frank E. Aiple, Frank J. R. Aiple, Elizabeth Aiple, Herman Piper, Elmer Malon, Howard Cassett, Gertrude Cassett, Ella Kennedy.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., May 3, 1940.

Representative JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Hope you will do what you can to either defeat Wheeler-Lea bill or eliminate its water-transportation section.

G. V. THOMSON.

FUGINA & DRESSER,
WINONA, MINN., May 6, 1940.

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
House of Representatives, Office Building.

DEAR MR. ALEXANDER: Upper Mississippi River steamboat owners, officers, employees, and the users of the waterways are very much opposed to the Wheeler-Lea bill, S. 2009, and they sincerely hope you can see your way clear to help kill this bill.

As a master and pilot during the busy rafting days I could foresee a great future for the upper Mississippi, if a deep channel were provided. I, therefore, took an active part in the promotion of the 9-foot channel project. Since it is proving such a great success it would be a crime to strangle it now with this unfair and unnecessary legislation.

Copy of a letter sent to Congressman AUGUST H. ANDRESEN,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ANDRESEN: The undersigned wish to call your attention to the farmers' interest in the matter of the transportation bill known as the Lee-Wheeler bill. We are critical of any proposal that sets out to regulate transportation of inland waterways so that rates will conform to present railroad freight rates. According to our understanding of the conference report on this bill this is precisely what the Lee-Wheeler bill now prescribes for a cure for transportation ailments.

One of the undersigned, C. C. Campbell, who is employed by a group of farmers as manager of the Cooperative Oil Association of Goodhue County has been active together with employees of other cooperative associations in gathering facts on the proposition of utilizing waterway transportation in the interests of the producer and the consumer in our area. On the matter of grain transportation by barge, markets were found for oats, rye, and feed barley. In the south and east that should bring a realization to the producer of 5 to 10 cents more per bushel than the present Red Wing Market affords. Markets were found for other agriculture commodities such as alfalfa which appears to have interesting possibilities for the producers of this area. In view of the fact that it is generally admitted that agriculture is basic in Minnesota and that agriculture has been obtaining less and less of the consumer's dollar, but freight and transportation has been taking more and more, we believe no Minnesotan can be for this bill and also be for Minnesota.

To prove our point we submit the following table published by the Bureau of Agriculture Economics:

Our interest in this matter has caused us to check back on the history and origin of this bill, and it appears all pro-railroad and not pro-shipper or pro-consumer.

We hope we can count on you as our Representative to assist us in our efforts to defeat this bill.

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN ALEXANDER: The undersigned, representing agricultural organizations throughout the United States, on May 2, 1940, addressed to the President of the United States, and delivered at the White House, the following protest against enactment of the Wheeler-Lea omnibus transportation bill. At the same time they presented for the consideration of the President a bound copy of resolutions adopted by 25 national and regional agricultural groups protesting against the enactment of the Wheeler-Lea omnibus transportation bill, and the principle of restrictive control embodied in the legislation.

Among the resolutions delivered were the following: American Farm Bureau Federation; American National Live Stock Association; National Grange; National Farmers Union; National Cooperative Elevator Association; National League of Wholesale Fresh Fruit and Vegetable Distributors; National Wool Growers Association; Texas Sheep and Goat Raisers Association; United States Live Stock Association; Vermont State Grange; Nebraska Farm Bureau Federation; Indiana Farm Bureau, Inc.; Kansas Farm Bureau; Kansas Farmers Union; Louisiana State Wide Conference, Baton Rouge, La.; Mississippi Farm Bureau Federation; Missouri Farm Bureau Federation.

Respectfully yours,

Frederick Brenckman, National Grange; J. Elmer Brock, president, American National Live Stock Association; Irvin B. King, master, Washington State Grange; J. B. Wilson, secretary, Wyoming Wool Growers Association, executive committee, National Wool Growers Association; Oscar Heline, president, Farmer Grain Dealers Association of Iowa, Marcus, Iowa; T. M. Hoskins, manager, Lone Tree Farmers Exchange, Lone Tree, Iowa; Frank Rutherford, secretary, National Cooperative Elevator Association, Omaha, Nebr.; Earl Peterson, Midland Cooperative Wholesale, Minneapolis, Minn.; Herschel D. Newsom, master, Indiana State Grange.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 2, 1940.

HON. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We are opposed to the adoption of the conference report on the Wheeler-Lea transportation bill for the following reasons:

1. It ignores the public interest and lays the basis for a transportation monopoly.

2. It will increase the cost of distributing agricultural products, which cost the farmer has to bear, thereby reducing his income.

3. It will increase the cost of things that the farmer has to buy, thereby further reducing his income.

4. The destructive effects of this legislation upon agriculture will retard the economic recovery of the Nation, and this in turn cannot fail to adversely affect the railroads themselves, who are the advocates of this bill.

5. Those who drafted this legislation appear to have lost sight of the fundamental purpose for which Government regulation was established; namely, to protect the public interest. Instead of adhering to this sound principle, under the bill regulation would be employed to stifle competition and to bring water and motor rates up to the level of rail rates, regardless of the cost of rendering the service.

The cost of transportation is the heaviest service charge that the farmer has to pay. Approximately 20 percent of all the freight revenues accruing to the railroads are derived from carrying agricultural products to market. In 1929 the farmer's freight bill amounted to $1,000,000,000. In 1937, when the farmer's income was greatly reduced, the figure was $638,000,000. These items do not include the freight charges paid on commodities purchased by the farmer, which he must likewise pay.

Last year the farmer received only 39 cents out of every dollar paid by the consumer for food. At the depth of the depression the farmer's share of the consumer's dollar dropped to 33 cents. While transportation and distribution must be regarded as legitimate and indispensable functions in the affairs of civilization, the fact remains that when those who merely transport and distribute the products of our farms receive vastly more than the share that goes to the producer, it amounts to the same thing as the perpetration of an economic crime. Instead of ameliorating the conditions that have so long handicapped agriculture in matters relating to transporation, the pending bill would most certainly aggravate the situation.

We are sensible of the fact that railroads are a necessity, and we want every properly managed railroad to be solvent and prospercus but we must not lose sight of the fact that agriculture is also a necessity, even more fundamental to the well-being and the very existence of man than the railroads or any other agency of transportation can possibly be. Common sense should teach those who are charged with the management of our railroads that they cannot expect to benefit by reducing to bankruptcy the fundamental industry upon which their prosperity rests.

There is justification for condemning the report of the conference committee on the transportation bill by virtue of the fact that the Miller-Wadsworth amendment which passed both House and Senate was entirely eliminated from the bill. The gist of this amendment was to the effect that no form of transportation could be compelled to charge higher rates than would be compensatory. The full wording of the amendment was as follows:

"In order that the public at large may enjoy the benefit and economy afforded by each type of transportation, the Commission shall permit each type of carrier or carriers to reduce rates so long as such rates maintain a compensatory return to the carrier or carriers after taking into consideration overhead and all other elements entering into the cost to the carrier or carriers for the service rendered: Provided, That nothing in this paragraph shall be construed so as to affect the long-and-short-haul provision of section 4."

It is manifest that with the Miller-Wadsworth amendment stricken out, the declaration of policy contained in section 1 constitutes nothing but empty words because nothing contained in the bill gives the public any assurance that it will receive the benefit of transportation at the lowest possible cost. In our opinion the Miller-Wadsworth amendment was so fair and reasonable that it would be nothing short of tragic to pass the bill without this provision.

Those who are engaged in agricultural pursuits find an additional reason for dissatisfaction in the report of conference committee because an amendment adopted by the House which provided for reduced rates on farm products for export, comparable to the lower rates granted to industry in this connection, was eliminated.

We maintain that there are only two legitimate grounds upon which the Government could justify itself in attempting to regulate transportation on our inland waterways and in the coastwise trade. One of these grounds would be in the interest of public safety, and the other to protect the public against monopolistic practices. So far as safety is concerned, the Department of Commerce already looks after that; and when it comes to protecting the public against monopoly, the truth is that no monopoly whatsoever exists among the carriers on our inland waterways, nor in the coastwise trade. The rivers, the lakes, and the seas are open to all.

So far from breaking up any monopoly among the water carriers, which in reality is nonexistent, the pending legislation takes a long step toward creating a monopoly.

The carriers now operating would be permitted to continue, subject to rules and regulations laid down by the Interstate Commerce Commission; but before it would be possible to establish a new service, it would be necessary to secure from the Commission a certificate of public convenience and necessity. If this bill should be enacted it is very doubtful if there would be any new water carriers, because the legislation is so worded as to virtually instruct the Interstate Commerce Commission to deny any person a certificate of convenience and necessity if the Commission comes to the conclusion that the present transportation facilities are adequate to take care of existing commerce. The fate that befell many of the common and contract carriers under the grandfather clause of the Motor Carrier Act of 1935 furnishes an example of what may happen to many of our water carriers if the present bill is passed.

As the Secretary of War, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Chairman of the Maritime Commission well said in a joint letter addressed to Senator JOSIAH W. BAILEY, on February 16, 1940, in opposition to this legislation:

"Certificates of public convenience and necessity should not be used to create a monopoly in the branch of transportation industry where monopoly is presently nonexistent and where the public interest requires that competition, although it should be regulated to prevent abuses, should not be limited or discouraged. The great advantage of water transportation to shippers is the flexibility and variety of service it can offer. Certificates of public convenience and permits would destroy this advantage and stifle competition. The same effect of stifling competition is discernible in the provisions of the bills, that except with the permission of the Interstate Commerce Commission, no carrier can operate both as a common carrier and as a contract carrier."

We think the writers of the joint letter already mentioned are on the right track when they said:

"All the provisions of the bills seem designed to free the railroads from restraints and obligations, while imposing restrictions on their water competitors and making it more expensive for the public to move freight. Under these provisions inland-water carriers can easily be regulated out of existence without the recapture of enough tonnage to affect railroad earnings appreciably."

We also endorse the further statement of the writers of the joint letter when they declare:

"Farmers and other shippers should not be required to pay rates based on transportation costs of properties improvidently built, wastefully operated, or partially obsolete. The advocacy of thorough regulation of the minimum rates of motor and water carriers by a centralized agency appears to represent an attempt to use Government power to bring competing transportation agencies into a cartel, and in this manner to share traffic and adjust rates in such a way as to earn a return upon all transportation capital of these agencies. The present high rail-rate level would be protected from the impact of vigorous competition. Undoubtedly such a policy would also result in more rigid rates in times of depression, since the motor carrier and the boat line would no longer play their role as an effective competitive force in bringing down rail rates on commodities susceptible to rail or truck, and rail or water movement."

We are impressed by the fact that the general public has had no opportunity whatever to become acquainted with the conference report on the transportation bill; the Members of Congress as a whole have not had time to familiarize themselves with its details; there is no public demand for this legislation; it is filled with numerous objectionable features and ambiguities, and for the good of all we are strongly of the opinion that it should be defeated.

Respectfully submitted.

MARINE JOURNAL,
New York, May 4, 1940.

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: For over a year I have been painstakingly investigating and comparing the ton-mile freight rates on our railroads to determine whether the present personnel of the I. C. C. has been guilty of discrimination between different parts of the country.

The results of my investigations show conclusively that these gentlemen are utterly unfit to be entrusted with regulating the freight rates of our waterways.

Normally freight rates by water are no more than 60 percent of the competing railroad charge for the selfsame haul.

The result of that reduction in freight rates has been a greatly expanded commerce and a substantial increase in the returns to producers and consumers.

Should the power be given to the I. C. C. to prevent the waterways carriers from reducing their freight rates below the freight rates quoted by the railroads, this entire waterways commerce will unquestionably shrivel up and producers and consumers will be asked to foot the bill.

It will be economic suicide for the waterways carrier to try to do business at the same freight rates as competing railroads charge, since his speed of delivery is much slower.

Therefore, defeat the Wheeler-Lea bill.

Very truly yours,

JOHN L. BOGERT,
Associate Editor, Marine Journal.

In addition to the above, I have received many messages from organizations such as the Minneapolis Junior Chamber of Commerce, members and officials of the Civic and Commerce Association, various civic clubs, and groups interested in the welfare of our State and the northwest area, and all of whom have voiced opposition to S. 2009 in no uncertain terms.

However, from the railroad-labor organizations of the Big Five Brotherhoods I have received unmistakable evidence of their clear vision in this matter, and submit herewith only a portion of the wires and letters received, in which there is expressed the most forceful opposition to the enactment of the conference report:

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., May 4, 1940.

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Understand House of Representatives will consider omnibus transportation bill (S. 2009) Thursday, May 9, and that motion will be made to recommit bill to joint conference committee for further consideration. This bill reported to Congress Friday, April 26, with consolidation section and Harrington amendment entirely eliminated. S. 2009 does not change present law respecting railroad consolidations and does not provide adequate protection for employees in event of consolidation. Respectfully request you vote to recommit bill and demand insertion of good, strict provision for protection of labor, such as Harrington amendment, in order safeguard employees threatened loss of jobs by consolidations.

ST. PAUL, MINN., May 6, 1940.

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned general chairmen, Railway Transportation Brotherhoods, State of Minnesota, urge you to recommit the measure generally referred to as the omnibus transportation bill, with instructions to reinsert the consolidation provisions with full protection for labor. Will appreciate your support of movement to recommit.

HONORABLE SIR: Motion will be made to recommit conference report on S. 2009 when presented on the floor of the House on May 9, 1940. It is the desire of all railroad workers in Minnesota that you vote to recommit for the purpose of reinserting section 8, which protects the public in increased fixed charges of funded debt and protects the employment of employees in mergers and consolidations. This is very, very important to railroad workers. Thanks.

JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
Congressman, House Office Building:

Order of Railway Conductors from the State of Minnesota urge you recommit the omnibus transportation bill, S. 2009, with instructions that the consolidation provision with full provision for labor be reinserted. We also request you use your efforts with other Congressmen in support of the motion to recommit.

F. H. WILSON,
Chairmain, Order of Railway Conductors, Legislative Committee for Minnesota.

CHICAGO, ILL.

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
Member of Congress, House of Representatives:

Approximately 1,000 general chairmen representing employees in the transportation service of the railroads of the United States now in session at Chicago are deeply concerned in railroad bill, S. 2009, and they have authorized us to urge you to support the motion to recommit the conference report on this bill, which will be considered by the House on Thursday, May 9, and provide protections against unemployment resulting from consolidations, etc. We appeal to your sense of justice and fairness to save railway employees from the menace of further unemployment.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: A few days ago I received in the mail a copy of your remarks which appeared in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 1769, concerning the proposed Transportation Act of 1929, Senate bill No. 2009.

Your action in bringing to the attention of the Members of the House of Representatives the necessity for retaining the Harrington amendment in this bill is most commendable, not only from the viewpoint of organized railroad labor but from the viewpoint of business and professional men, farmers, and laborers in every class and craft. Any legislation adopted by Congress that would result in the elimination of a quarter of a million jobs is a serious matter and one that does not deserve the support of any fair-minded or honest representative of the people. Such legislation will not solve the financial problems of the railroads, but, instead, would automatically increase the financial difficulties of all forms of industry and would be especially harmful to the small-business man and merchant who has already been driven back to the last trench by corporate wealth which operates the chain stores and mail-order houses.

If the Members of Congress will just stop and think seriously before voting on this legislation I feel confident that Senate bill No. 2009 will not be adopted unless the Harrington amendment is included.

Very truly yours,

W. M. DOLAN,
General Chairman, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen.

[Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, Order of Railway Conductors, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, Switchmen's Union of North America, representing employees engaged in railroad transportation service]

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 1, 1940.

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: The undersigned chief executives of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, the Order of Railway Conductors, the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, and the Switchmen's Union of North America, which organizations represent all of the railroad workers actually engaged in operating railroad transportation facilities, are disappointed to learn that the conference committee which considered S. 2009, has stricken out of the bill the consolidation section as amended by the House. This section provided protection to railway employees against unemployment. It prohibited the legalizing of consolidations or mergers which would increase fixed charges on funded debt unless the Commission should find it to be positively in the public interest to do so. This was a most important protection to the public and indirectly very helpful to railroad employees. The section contained also other provisions very helpful to the public and railway employees. In brief, there have been taken out of the bill the only provisions which were of direct benefit to the men actually engaged in operating railroad transportation equipment and facilities. Railway workers are, therefore, much concerned.

The five transportation labor organizations very earnestly urge your support of a motion to recommit the conference report, which motion, among other things, will contain a provision instructing the conferees to reinsert the consolidation section of S. 2009, as reported by the House committee, with an amendment to protect railway labor against unemployment, copy of which amendment is hereto attached.

During the last few years the number of railroad employees has been reduced by one-half, and naturally, therefore, railway workers are greatly alarmed by the menace of a still greater increase in unemployment. There is no doubt of the overwhelming sentiment in Congress for adequate labor protection in this bill.

The following is quoted from the statement by the Honorable ROBERT CROSSER, of Ohio, member of the conference committee which considered S. 2009, 2511 of the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

"I do, however, express disappointment at the elimination of section 8, relating to consolidation, etc., which I felt was helpful to the general public interest and to the welfare of employees."

Expressing the sincere hope that you will support the motion to recommit the conference report, we are,

Very respectfully yours,

A. JOHNSTON,
Grand Chief Engineer, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.

D. B. ROBERTSON,
President, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen.

GRAND LODGE, BROTHERHOOD OF RAILROAD TRAINMEN,
Cleveland, Ohio, May 6, 1940.

The Honorable CLARENCE F. LEA,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN LEA: I take pleasure in replying to your courteous inquiry by letter of May 2.

As you have previously been informed, the source of our opposition to the Wheeler-Lea transportation bill, S. 2009, was the fact that, as you have many times stated, the consolidation section of that bill proposed to facilitate railroad consolidations. The House conferees correctly stated in their report, which report was signed by yourself, at page 61:

"Employees had a fear of unemployment, and to some extent communities feared the loss of transportation due to the possible consolidations under present circumstances, where a revival of the transportation industry might show that such consolidations were unwarranted."

We have felt all along, as have 275 Members of Congress who signed a petition on behalf of adequate labor protection, that this Congress should deal courageously with this justified fear of unemployment and deflation of communities. As stated in the joint letter to Congress from the five transportation brotherhoods, the joint conferees struck from the proposed bill the consolidation section as amended by the House, which was the only provision in the entire bill that proposed direct benefits to railroad labor. To be sure, when this provision was stricken from the bill, the provisions designed to facilitate consolidations also were stricken, and accordingly, as I advised you in my telegram of April 29, that removed the source of our opposition to S. 2009. But also, as I advised you in that telegram, "we shall continue our earnest effort to obtain legal protection for labor in consolidation and abandonment situations." We naturally urge recommitment of the conference report as affording the only present opportunity of achieving legal protection to the railroad workers we represent, the workers most seriously affected by railroad consolidations.

In your address, as reported in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 2685, you suppose that our efforts along these lines would be confined to the separate bill which Congressman HARRINGTON, of Iowa, introduced after the joint conferees failed to provide for adequate labor protection. Do I understand that your committee will give this bill speedy consideration and do all possible to obtain action on it at this session of Congress? I am sure you understand that, unless the committee of which you are chairman would give wholehearted cooperation and support, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to obtain action at this session of Congress; hence, we have no practical alternative but to seek recommitment, with the hope that the conferees will respond to this great demand for adequate labor protection against the desire of railroad bankers to economize at the expense of railroad workers.

In your letter of May 2 you suggest that in favoring recommitment we have made ourselves "a party with a group fighting to destroy the bill." The only possible interpretation that can be placed upon that conclusion is that you are convinced, in advance, that the conferees will not carry out the wishes of the House of Representatives and write into their report the adequate labor protective provisions so clearly favored by an overwhelming majority of the Members of the House. In such a contingency it would be the conferees, rather than we who favor recommitment, that would "destroy the bill." We have no intentions or aspirations to destroy the bill; we ask only that the voice of democracy be harkened to and the wishes of the majority be reponded to. If that is done, S. 2009 will yet become law this session of Congress.

Your address, as reported in the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 3, suggests that your conception of the labor protective provision is entirely erroneous. You state that such a legal provision would have the effect of imposing "on the employer the duty of indefinite if not a lifetime support of employees for whom he no longer has a job." As a practical matter you must know that is not so. Average railroad consolidations eliminate from 20 percent to 25 percent of the employees. With the labor protective provision, those employees youngest in point of service would be spared that fate, and the eliminations would come from the other end of the seniority list, as deaths, resignations, and retirements occurred. Such attrition from deaths, resignations, and retirements, for all railroad employees, now averages upwards of 5 percent per year; but for train-service employees, who are most severely affected by consolidations, the attrition rate is between 2.5 percent and 3.5 percent. Thus, on the whole, employee eliminations from consolidations would be gradually and humanely absorbed within a short period of time, especially with an increase in railroad business, which is claimed if S. 2009 is enacted into law. The only way in which you could be correct in your reference to "lifetime support" is to assume that the lifetime of railroad workers will be short, indeed. Although we railroad employees feel somewhat hardier than that, it may be true that if you force tens of thousands of us into the bread lines you will so shorten our span of life.

I must again remind you that railroad financial interests have expressed the hope that they could save $500,000,000 annually from consolidations if they succeed in obtaining enactment of S. 2009 without the labor protective feature. Eighty percent, or $400,000,000 of that sum would come from payrolls. The so-called Washington Jobs Agreement, executed 4 years before this ambitious banker program was revealed, constitutes only what the railroad financial interests would agree to—it is not a standard of equity or social desirability.

You erroneously refer to the proposed labor-protective provision as a "dismissal wage" proposition. The dismissal wage is only another attempt to achieve national prosperity by providing meager compensation for nonproduction. Before concluding that such an arrangement is equitable, ask yourself if you would be willing to forego pursuit of your life's calling for a mere 60 percent of your present salary for a few months. Railroad employees want honest pay for honest work; that is what the labor-protective proposal offers. A dismissal-wage proposition proposes to buy up, at bankrupt prices, the jobs of needy workers. I regard the Washington dismissal-wage agreement of 1936 now as I did when it was executed, on which occasion I said:

"I want to emphasize that, so far as the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen is concerned, the agreement with the carriers relative to consolidation and coordination can in no sense be interpreted to mean that the way is clear for railroad consolidation and coordination. This brotherhood will continue to fight as vigorously as it always has such efforts to economize at the expense of humanity. * * * We have now entered into an agreement with the carriers, designed not to improve the standards of living or working conditions of railroad workers but to share with them a small portion of the booty that would come to the coupon clippers if Wall Street's demand for 'economy' at the expense of humanity is carried out."

I am sure that when you ponder these considerations in the light of the fact that unemployment and business deflation constitute the Nation's No. 1 economic problem, you will understand why we are anxious that S. 2009 be recommitted, so that you and your colleagues among the House conferees may yet be given an opportunity to recommend a bill that will be of great benefit to the country.

I hope I have made our position entirely clear to you, but if questions still arise in your mind please submit them to me. In order that my position may be clearly understood by all Members of Congress, I am mailing to each of them a copy of your letter of inquiry, together with a copy of this reply.

With best wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

A. F. WHITNEY, President.

In addition to the above I have received requests from thousands of truck drivers and trucking companies expressing disapproval, and submit one of these herewith as representative of the others:

IRREGULAR COMMON CARRIER ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA,

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The purpose of this communication is to respectfully urge that you support the motion to return S. 2009 to conference for further consideration.

As passed by the House, the bill contained certain safeguards for the protection of the shipper and the small low-cost carrier. These included the Miller-Wadsworth amendment, which was adopted by both Houses of Congress; and the provision in section 21 (a) of the House bill protecting the rights of the irregular common carriers under the "grandfather" clause of the Motor Carrier Act. In addition to eliminating these safeguards, the conferees have recommended shifting the burden of proof to the carrier proposing to reduce a rate, instead of requiring that protestants establish that it is improper. The imposition of this burden upon the carrier is particularly startling in view of the statement of the chairman in the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for May 3, as follows:

"Generally speaking, lower rates where not involving any unfair or destructive effect should be encouraged, instead of handicapped."

It is our considered judgment that this legislation as now drafted will work considerable injury and hardship upon the smaller carriers and upon shippers who utilize and need their services. We therefore strongly urge that you vote for and actively support the move to return this bill to conference.

Respectfully yours,

IRREGULAR COMMON CARRIER
ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA,
By JOHN C. MILLER, President.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD in opposition to the bill S. 2009, in which remarks I wish to insert various telegrams and letters from farm organizations and individuals in Minnesota against the bill; also from various railroad labor organizations against the bill, including practically all the railroad labor organization members in the State of Minnesota.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under special order heretofore granted, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. ANGELL] is recognized for 15 minutes.

A COMMERCIAL, ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND DEFENSE ANALYSIS OF STRATEGIC AND CRITICAL MINERAL PROBLEM

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, the importation of strategic and critical minerals is a national problem of sizable proportions. Aside from the interest in, and the necessity for providing for the common defense, this mineral situation has pretentious economic, commercial, and social aspects. This mineral importation represents an average annual value of about 86 percent of the total metal production in the United States. It also represents an employment displacement equal in number to our total direct metal mining wage earners.

Raw mineral ores—metallic and nonmetallic—and synthetic agricultural products constitute the base on which modern industrial activity rests. What we now see in Scandanavia is a struggle for the control of iron ore, which is perhaps the principal industrial metallic material.

Congress is appropriating large sums for military and naval expansion. How effective will these appropriations be unless we remove the bottlenecks created by a deficiency of strategic and critical materials? To make these defense appropriations more effective, we must definitely solve this material problem. Aside from being our principal defense problem, it is one of our outstanding commercial, economic, and social questions. Nationally we need to know where we stand.

I have long thought of coupling Bonneville with the latent resources of the Northwest. This is the motivating reason for my research in this field. My study confirms this early judgment, but at the same time impresses me with the seriousness of the national problem.

HISTORY OF THE PROBLEM

Mr. Speaker, this is no new problem. We first knew of it from our unfortunate and demorialized industrial experience in World War No. 1. We then became suddenly aware of our lack of essential materials. In a quick attempt to cure the situation we hastily conceived and executed a wasteful and extravagant program. Submarines and military appropriation of transports cut off the essential material sources at a time when our War and Navy Departments were speeding up the industrial machine. In 1917 we had no advance plan when the emergency struck our essential industries. Only the shortness of our active war participation saved us from industrial chaos.

In the Defense Act of 1920, Congress placed upon The Assistant Secretary of War the responsibility of providing a plan for industrial mobilization and the procurement of necessary materials. As a result of this charge progress has been made, but this planning has brought to the front our supply-base weakness.

About 1922 the War Department sought the suggestions of a joint committee from the two National Mining Societies. In 1924 this joint committee recommended:

First. The purchase, importation, and storage of stock piles of these strategic and critical materials.

Second. The discouragement of artificial domestic stimuli such as tariffs and subsidies.

These two suggestions were not made the base for any legislation nor was the manganese stock pile suggestion, incorporated in the 1927 annual report of the Secretary of War, formally presented to Congress. Wartime strategic mines, with the collapse of high prices, were forced to shut down. A demand for tariff protection followed, which resulted in a mild inclusion in the Tariff Act of 1922. These duties were increased in the act of 1930. Duty on two of these materials has been reduced by reciprocal-trade agreements, namely, manganese and a special grade of mica.

In 1931 the War Department again requested a mineral report from a group of outstanding mining engineers. This group reported the same conclusions as the 1924 group, with the addition of a recommendation for concrete research by the proper Government agencies, to the end that fully demonstrated methods—for exploiting submarginal domestic deposits—may be in hand on the eve of a war emergency. In 1934 the President's Mineral Planning Committee made the same recommendations.

In 1938 the Director of the United States Bureau of Mines urged the mining industry to support the recommendations of these committees with the additional suggestion that $500,000 be appropriated annually for investigation and study of means to use our domestic reserves as a permanent solution of the problem.

In June 1939 Congress passed the Thomas Act, authorizing $100,000,000 a year for a 4-year purchasing program of strategic minerals for stock piles. In addition this bill authorized $500,000 annually for 4 years for investigation of domestic resources of these minerals with the view of stimulating domestic production.

This legislation is a step in the right direction. However, it would seem that we need to go still further. Safeguarding stock piles for a long period is not practical. Nationally we need to be independent. This requires that we know what we really have, how to use submarginal deposits, and how to develop substitute processes and materials. In short, there is a large field for research based on a real inventory of assets.

PRINCIPAL INDUSTRIAL MATERIALS

Finch and Farness in their Analysis of the Strategic Mineral Problem list the following principal industrial materials:

Metals: Aluminum, antimony, chromite, copper, iron, lead, manganese, mercury, nickel, tin, tungsten, zinc.

Nonmetals: Asbestos, barite, China clay, coal, fluorspar, graphite, gypsum, magnesite, mica, nitrates, petroleum, phosphates, potash, pyrites, sulfur, talc.

PRODUCTION ABILITY

As an index covering the production ability of the principal nations of the world, I am presenting table 1.

TABLE 1.—Production ability of principal countries to supply primary industrial metals

[Number of metallic and nonmetallic ores available and controlled, or not available for domestic consumption out of 12 primary metals and 16 primary nonmetallic ores. This table indicates number of ores but is not an index of quantity or quality]

Country	Number of metallic ores		Number of nonmetallic ores
	Available	Not available	Available	Not available
United States	5	7	7	9
United Kingdom	10	2	13	3
France	4	8	6	10
Germany	0	12	6	10
Italy	5	7	8	8
Japan	2	10	7	9
Belgium	1	9	0	16

(Data derived from chart, p. 2, of Analysis of Strategic Mineral Problem of United States, by Finch and Furness, U. S. Bureau of Mines.)

This table only covers supply self-sufficiency of materials. It is a material number index only, and furnishes no measure of quantity or quality available in each country. However, it does show that we do not have the material independence of the United Kingdom. In number of available materials we rank next to Britain. This table also points out, impressively, the plight of Germany, Japan, and Belgium. A full understanding of this table will explain existing world-wide conditions.

STRATEGIC MATERIALS

Mr. Speaker, strategic materials are defined as those essential materials on which supply reliance must be placed on foreign sources. Critical materials can also be defined as those defense materials presenting some difficult procurement problems but of a less serious nature than the case of strategic materials. The critical-materials problem requires research and legislation to control conservation and distribution. The Munitions Board's listing of strategic and critical minerals is as follows:

Strategic minerals in order of priority: Manganese, chromium, tin, tungsten, nickel, quartz crystals, aluminum, antimony, iodine, mica, mercury.

Alphabetic list critical minerals: Abrasive, arsenic, asbestos, cadmium, copper, cryolite, fluorspar, graphite, helium, iron and steel, lead, magnesium, molybdenum, petroleum, phosphate, platinum, potash, refractories, sulfur and pyrites, titanium, uranium, vanadium, zinc, zirconium.

IMPORTATIONS

Mr. Speaker, in tables 2 and 3 is presented data on the importation of strategic and critical metals. This data was independently worked out from material in Roush's Strategic Mineral Supplies, and the Mineral Yearbooks of the United States Bureau of Mines. Importations fluctuate from year to year because of the business cycle, and also because of importations for industrial stocks. I have, therefore, tabulated the fluctuations both in the good and lean years, and have struck off a mean value, which is the basis of these tables. I have added magnesium to the list prepared by the experts in this field. Magnesium is the metal of the future. It is lighter than aluminum and much stronger, and, in addition, will furnish a limited substitute for tin products. There are extensive deposits of this basic ore in the Northwest. This metal can help solve our deficiency problem. Germany is developing magnesium for airplane construction from much lower grades of ore than are found in the Northwest.

TABLE 2.—Strategic metals

Metal	Unit of measurement	Long-time average apparent consumption	Long-time average apparent domestic production	Equivalent imported consumption	Average price per unit	Value of average imports
Bauxite ore (aluminum)	Metric ton	540,000	320,000	220,000	$6.50	[1] $1,430,000
Antimony	Metric ton	12,360	2,050	10,310	[2] .11	2,500,000
Chromium	Metric ton	188,300	7,800	181,500	24.00	[3] 7,200,000
Iodine	Pound	1,249,000	274,000	1,075,000	1.00	[4] 1,075,000
Manganese	Metric ton	561,400	41,400	520,000	16.70	[5] 8,700,000

Tin	Long ton	63,500	([10])	63,500	[2] .45	63,800,000
Platinum	Troy ounce	229,000	46,000	183,000	28.50	5,220,000
Tungsten	Short ton	3,225	1,225	2,000	1,075.00	2,150,000
Total						113,886,000

[1] 14-year average, since time that domestic ore production was curtailed.
[2] Per pound.
[3] Chromium consumption has materially increased in last few years. The figures presented represent modern use, since advent of stainless steel.
[4] Last 6-year average, since the start of American production.
[5] Taken from value of imports, rather than unit price as manganese content of ore varies widely.
[6] Estimated on basis of modern development.
[7] Per flask.
[8] Based on commercial flasks of 76 pounds.
[9] Based on total difference of imports and exports. There are so many different grades of mica imported that a single price will not be representative of all mica importations.
[10] Practically none.

NOTE.—Consumption, imports, and prices fluctuate from year to year. These tabular quantities do not represent any specific year, but are a composite average of boom and depression years derived from graphs platted from data given in the mineral yearbooks and Rusch's Strategic Minerals in order to set a composite average-apparent long-time average, and to eliminate fluctuations resulting from stocking imports.

TABLE 3.—Critical minerals—Value of imports

Minerals:
Abrasives	$5,768,500
Arsenic	723,400
Asbestos	8,315,400
Cadmium	1,080,000
Copper	[1] 24,000,000
Cryolite	1,134,000
Fluorspar	390,000
Graphite	560,000
Lead	656,000
Molybdenum	59,000
Phosphate	2,585,000
Potash	16,850,000
Titanium, uranium, vanadium	811,000
Zinc and zirconium	800,000
Total	63,723,300

[1] Estimated on basis of 480,000,000 pounds, at 5 cents per pound.

It will be noted that the annual mean importations of strategic and critical minerals total $177,600,000. When this total is compared with the total annual value of the products of metal mines in the United States the significance of this problem is apparent. The 1935 value of products of all metal-mining industries in the United States is given by the United States Department of Commerce as $206,000,864.

MINING EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Speaker, there is a direct relationship between the value of mining products and the number of employed wage earners. To show this relationship I have compiled Table 4 from data in the Department of Commerce's 1939 Edition of Industrial Market Data Handbook of the United States.

TABLE 4.—Relationship, value of products, and number of wage earners; metal mining

State	Value of product	Expenditures for materials and supplies	Number of wage earners
California	$30,550,658	$7,422,051	12,021
Colorado	12,988,490	5,113,780	5,574
Idaho	14,137,081	2,934,283	3,754
Montana	25,481,248	9,067,192	6,959
Nevada	12,120,855	3,492,498	3,663
Oregon	1,776,157	660,543	1,321
Utah	20,728,634	4,584,636	4,523
	117,783,123	33,274,983	37,811

Composite averages:
Number mine wage earners per million value of products	321
Expenditures materials and supplies per million of product	$283,000
Employment of materials and supplies per million of products	46
Total wage earners in mining and fabrication of mining supplies per million-dollar value of mining product	367

Calculated from statistical data in U. S. Department of Commerce's Industrial Market Data Handbook, 1939 edition.

Based on the given relationship between value of products and employment, the direct wage earners displaced by the importation of strategic and critical minerals is as follows:

Direct wages earners in mines	57,200
Wage earners represented by materials used in mines	8,200
Total displaced direct wage earners	64,400

This direct displacement is 25 percent higher than the total industrial employment in the State of Oregon. The industries of Oregon, on the average, give employment to 52,200 wage earners and produce an annual pay roll of $53,070,000 and products valued at $265,437,000. This comparison points out the large possibilities inherent in the development of the latent resources of the Northwest.

INDIRECT PAY ROLL

For every person gainfully employed in mining or industry, there is, conservatively, at least two to three persons gainfully employed in agriculture, construction, finance, trade transportation, and some seven other lines of major employment activities. Direct employment in mine or factory induces employment in other lines. To show this relationship, I am presenting table 5.

TABLE 5.—Distribution of United States employment

	Equivalent full-time employment	Percent of total
Agriculture	9,925,000	24.0
Construction	719,000	1.7
Finance and government	3,128,000	7.5
Manufacturing	[1]8,512,000	20.6
Mining (all mining)	[2]745,000	1.8
Railroads	[3]1,014,000	2.4
Trade	6,572,000	15.9
Services	6,562,000	15.9

Other	1,379,000	3.3
Miscellaneous	2,030,000	4.9
Total	41,411,000	100.0

[1] This figure is slightly higher than that reported by the U. S. Department of Commerce in Industrial Market Data Handbook for 1935. This difference is due to including in the figure presented herewith average part-time employment.

This table presents the best guide as to the part played by each section of the over-all employment sources in the national economy.
Based on chart IV, Structure American Economy, June 1939, National Resources Committee, p. 63.

The modern key which can unlock the door leading to the storehouse of latent resources is electrometallurgical, electrochemical, and electrothermal processes. Cheap hydroelectric power is the Northwest's greatest resource. If wisely used, it will become a national, as well as a great local asset. Electric processes can make the opening of mines possible. Opening mines will furnish materials for basic industrial development. Basic industries which use large amounts of power induce secondary industries which are large users of manpower but smaller users of mechanical power. In addition to latent minerals the Northwest has vast forestry and agricultural resources. The same energy methods can be applied to forestry and agricultural wastes and products.

The lack of metallurgical coke has kept iron and steel industries from locating in the Northwest. Recently developed processes point out the way to manufacture synthetic coke from wood wastes. Any mining and industrial development requires collateral transportation, finance, construction, trade, and utility services, with attendant indirect employment. The starting point in this development lies in tying together the energy sources and the latent products of the ground. We need to open mines and establish basic industries, and use waste forest and agricultural products.

NITROGEN

Mr. Speaker, during the last World War nitrogen and its compounds was No. 1 on the list of strategic materials. Four years ago this element was transferred from the strategic list to the critical list. Last year it was removed from the critical list because of progress made in synthetic production from the air.

The nitrogen situation furnished an illuminating example in what can be accomplished by research and investigation, and points out a definite avenue of approach in our present situation. The largest uses of nitrogen are for explosives and fertilizer. Practically the entire supply of the world's mineral nitrogen was concentrated in Chili, under monopolistic control. Foreign ownership early realized the importance of control both of production and trade routes. German capital then owned one-third of these nitrogen ores.

Space does not permit repeating the history of the political and commercial struggle over this Chilean ore. The 1914 British-German naval battle off the Falkland Islands resulted from the tussle to control the nitrate trade routes. The removal of German shipping from the high seas and the German blockade was of important military advantage to the Allies, but led to the development of synthetic processes and the overthrow of Chilean supremacy in the nitrogen industry. These facts together with the long-distance transportation and requirements of large tonnage space for the world's requirements, placed the synthetic nitrogen industry on its feet. The large concentration of this natural mineral ore is a place far removed from the consumption centers, and the world's dependence on a single remote source, induced the chemical industry to get to work on processes and substitutes.

There is very little new under the sun. All we have to do to progress is to observe, work, and experiment. From the beginning of time nature has taken nitrogen from the air. Thunderstorms and lightning have fixed nitrogen in the form of nitrogen oxide, which reaches the soil dissolved in rain. It has been estimated that each year lightning fixes 100,000,000 tons of atmospheric nitrogen, which Roush stated is 50 times the amount annually produced by man. Eighty percent of nature's fixation is lost at sea, and a large part of the remaining 20 percent falls on unproductive land. Only 2 to 9 pounds per acre annually reach tilled land, depending on the frequency of thunderstorms. When man's ingenuity went to work and imitated nature, or developed byproduct processes, or produced artificial lightning under a control system of occurrence, the air and coal mines were opened for nitrogen production. This development has been rapid and has progressed to such a point that 75 percent of the world's nitrogen requirements are now supplied from synthetic sources. The air's supply of nitrogen is unlimited.

Besides production from natural sources, there have been developed two principal synthetic sources, namely, byproducts from coke and atmospheric nitrogen. The development of byproduct coke ovens started in the depression of 1893, and by 1914 domestic byproduct nitrogen supplied one-quarter of our domestic requirements. Since the World War byproduct nitrogen production has increased rapidly. The amount of such byproduct production depends on our coke and steel requirements. The difference between our consumption and byproduct production can be supplied from atmospheric sources.

Three processes have been worked out for fixing atmospheric nitrogen. This conversion can be effected by the cyanamide process, the high-tension electric spark, or catalytic action at high temperatures and pressures in the formation of ammonia. As a war measure, Congress authorized the construction of a 40,000-short ton cyanamide plant at Muscle Shoals. This plant was completed after the armistice but has not been in operation except for test purposes. The largest cyanamide plant in existence is the 80,000-ton plant at Niagara Falls, Canada, just over our border. The first synthetic-ammonia plant was built in 1921. Nearly 90 percent of our synthetic-ammonia capacity is found in two plants at Charleston, W. Va., and Hopewell, Va. Chemical research has solved the nitrogen problem and assured our self-sufficiency in this material. This case is cited as an example we should follow.

THE REMOVAL OF OTHER MATERIAL DEFICIENCIES

Another of our World War shortages was potash, one of the three essential plant foods and a requisite in the manufacture of a number of products, including medicinal compounds and black gunpowder. Extensive exploration has located an inexhaustible supply in New Mexico and California. In spite of our developed potash independence, we import 350,000 tons annually to supply a consumption of 620,000 tons.

The Bureau of Mines has recently developed a new process for the production of pure electrolytic manganese, which is No. 1 on the current list of strategic metals. This process has been patented, and a use license was issued in 1938. A small manganese pilot plant is under construction in Knoxville, Tenn.

The Bureau of Mines and Washington State College have also recently developed a combined flotation and electric method for extracting magnesium metal from the lower-grade magnesite ores of the Pacific Northwest. In 1938 a method was found to protect lower-quality magnesium from corrosion. Another protective treatment has been developed through electrolysis. High-strength magnesium alloys have been produced experimentally. The Northwest Magnesite Co. has completed the construction of a 5-ton experimental plant for the beneficiation of magnesite ores. This work opens an avenue for the utilization of cheap Bonneville power for the production of magnesium from magnesite. This is a field of major proportions, and one in which great advances will be made. Magnesium can be substituted for some of the deficient metals.

The United States chemical industry was greatly stimulated by the World War. As a result of the present war, chemical industrial activity is now expanding on a world-wide basis. Synthetics in many fields are replacing natural materials, as better results have been obtained from controlled and stable processes. The most spectacular of recent developments has come in the field of plastics. For years we have imported millions of dollars' worth of natural gums, but this importation has dropped to small quantities. We are now able to manufacture high-grade synthetic gums for fibers and lacquers from agricultural products. Rayon is replacing imported silk.

What we must now consider is the commercial effect of the German ersatz progress. The soybean and castor-bean will become the raw-material base for a developing plastic industry. Many natural articles now in consumer trade will be produced synthetically. We need to watch the growth of world markets for new kinds of merchandise, and the effect dispersion of political exiles from Europe, with their inventive aptitude and their skill in trading, will make on our industry and commerce. If we are to hold our place as a nation, we must go into and solve this problem in an effective way. World conditions will not permit halfway measures.

Minerals amount to about one-sixth of our total imports. Of this amount 38 percent are strategic minerals and 21 percent are critical minerals. In addition we import about $119,000,000 in rubber. It is therefore apparent that a few materials occupy an important, and seemingly an indispensable, place in our world-wide over-all strategy.

In citing the advances made in synthetic production I do not want to create the impression that we are making exceptional progress. Modern industrial development has created new requirements, especially in the field of alloy steels. With the advance in technology, new requirements have come up about as fast as we have solved our older problems. Most of our rubber and tin—totaling in annual imports $188,900,000—come from the Dutch East Indies and the Malay states. The present implications are that we may have to secure rubber and tin from other sources. To protect this source of supply would require us to expend a billion dollars per year for an augmented navy. Could we not declare our independence in tin and rubber through technological synthetic developments? It could be done at a much lower price and keep us free from involvement in Old World affairs.

THE HANDICAP OF IMPORT RESTRICTION

Mr. Speaker, how restrictions can be placed upon us, by dependence on imports, is exemplified by the case of aluminum ore—bauxite. In the early days of the aluminum industry, domestic metal requirements were derived from domestic ores. In the interim, use of aluminum expanded sevenfold, and this industry had to seek foreign ore sources. Today one-half of our ore requirements are imported—almost entirely from British Guiana. After American exploitation in this country, a British ruling was issued limiting the use of ore on crown lands in any British territory to British capital. However, a concession was granted in the case of Guiana, provided the ore was reduced in British territory. This ruling resulted in the establishment of the large American-owned plants at Arvida and Shawinigan Falls, Quebec. We must realize that importations can impose political and commercial control by outsiders, adversely affecting our defense, employment, and commercial situation.

Bauxite deposits in the United States are small but large reserves of the submarginal ores, leucite and alunite, exist in Utah, Colorado, Wyoming, Oregon, and Washington. Further development in technology is needed for the commercial development of these submarginal ores. Occurrences of bauxite in Oregon have been reported, but further detailed surveys are needed to determine the quality and extent of these Oregon deposits.

The same situation existed as to nickel. After the Deutschland incident in 1915, Canada required smelting within her borders, resulting in the closing of our New Jersey nickel smelters.

MINERAL RESOURCES OF NORTHWEST

Forty-one mineral occurrences have been charted in the Pacific Northwest. This number includes 31 industrial metals, 9 of the 11 strategic metals, and 14 of the 24 critical metals. The extent and quality of all these occurrences has not been fully determined. Low-priced power for modern processes is available, and all that is needed to utilize these resources is an accurate inventory of quantity and quality of minerals and practical processes for beneficiation of the determined quality of the ores.

Under the Thomas Act the United States Geological Survey and the Bureau of Mines are authorized to make the necessary surveys and investigations. With the cooperation of the State Mining Bureaus, these two Federal agencies can make a wider coverage with the given appropriations. We have heard a great deal about these occurrences. Our first step is to determine really what we have of commercial value and then concentrate on the utilization of these determined values.

The region is short of fuels and metallurgical coal. This fact has hampered past industrial development. Low-priced hydro power is more than a substitute for these fuels. Such power is the most modern tool in the industrial kit.

Over all, we have sufficient information to conclude that a substantial part of these minerals are of low grade and occur in complex ores. The treatment of such ores cannot be accomplished by established standard processes, successfully used in the East under different conditions. We need to follow up such an inventory with investigation and experiment. We need also to develop new processes in pilot plants, and to fairly protect utilization against the "sidetracking" control of monopolies. Briefly, this is the formula which will tie together the power and mineral resources of the region into a great national asset. Again I must state that there is nothing new in this formula. It is the one used in Scandinavia, where natural endowments are similar to those of the Pacific Northwest. It was the cheap and abundant hydropower of Niagara, through electric processes, that made the automotive industry of Detroit possible.

THE SOLUTION

Mr. Speaker, in an emergency the lack of strategic and critical material sources will become a great national handicap. To solve this problem we cannot afford to wait until the arrival of such an emergency. Our industrial system cannot change its operations overnight. Any adjustments must be gradual and developed under normal conditions.

Aside from being a defense question, it is one of great commercial, economic, and social proportions. A partial solution of the unemployment problem is wrapped up in this matter, and it has a sufficient pressing demand to warrant further consideration by Congress. This problem is susceptible of a number of solutions, which I am collecting and restating. The solution to adopt will depend on the material. Most likely we will find that the most advantageous program will be a combination of several or more solutions. These are:

(1) Make it possible for the Geological Survey and the Bureau of Mines, with the cooperation of State agencies, to accumulate all available information on metal deposits.

(2) Expand surveys and samplings of reported occurrences to accurately determine extent and commercial quality of deposits.

(3) Advance processes or develop new methods for processing medium and lower grade ores, through research, experiment, and the construction of pilot plants.

(4) Increase domestic peacetime production.

(5) Adopt conservation measures for those materials where domestic reserves are definitely known to be limited.

(6) Expand recovery of secondary metals—scrap.

(7) Develop both general and limited substitutes.

(8) Build up reserve stocks, by use in other commercial channels, which can be converted to basic metals if necessary.

(9) Establish stock piles. Stocking is needed to protect immediately against the consequences of a long-delayed plan or adjustment of industry to new processes. At best, stock piles is a short-time expedient. On a long-time basis, it should not be attempted until possibilities of other solutions have been exhausted.

(10) Establish research in the collateral fields of prices, markets, cost of development, cost of operation of commercially feasible or undeveloped sources, and the accessibility and cost of transportation. [Applause.]

NEUTRALITY

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, but I look for a rising tide of war propaganda from now on. We are living in momentous times and in the midst of war hysteria that is being fanned into a white heat by every known device of propaganda and hatred. Former Ambassador James W. Gerard on emerging from the White House yesterday also added his voice to the ambassadorial chorus urging America's participation in the European war.

Developments in the Mediterranean may bring sensational news within 2 weeks, and likewise sensational outbursts of fury from the "I don't want to go to war—but" propagandists in America. It looks as if Italy may enter the war at any time, which would involve the Balkan nations and maybe Soviet Russia, and even Japan.

British merchant ships have been ordered out of the Mediterranean, but our ships are still there. It is possible that an American ship may be inadvertently bombed or torpedoed by any one of the dozen nations involved in the Mediterranean. The English lost a hundred ships from bombing and torpedoes during the Spanish Civil War. American ships are not immune from dangers of war if in the war zone.

No nation in the world wants war with us or would deliberately provoke it by sinking our ships. However, war is a desperate adventure, and neutral ships in the war zones are in constant danger. It might be well for us to order our ships out of the Mediterranean until the die is cast, or the danger is over, or at least if they want to stay let them stay at their own risk.

I warn the American people that the drums of war propaganda will resound from coast to coast, but at the same time I have complete faith in the sound judgment and wisdom of the American people who have already decided to preserve American neutrality and not to participate in foreign wars.

We want no Trojan horses of war in America, or that war is inevitable. The Trojan horses of communism and nazi-ism need investigation and constant vigilance, but they are as nothing to the dangers and menace of the Trojan horse of the internationalists and interventionists who, by intrigue and secret diplomacy, would involve us in war.

We know about the Trojan horse of Woodrow Wilson. We should beware of the Trojan horse of Franklin D. Roosevelt. It is a far more powerful and destructive horse than that of the Communists and Nazis. The modern, peaceable American Trojan horse is a war horse in disguise. We are even now being jockeyed into the bloody shambles of war under the pretext of entering the paradise of peace.

It is a sad and deplorable tragedy to read the constant Germanphobia and "I don't want to go to war—but" propaganda of certain well-known columnists, who are apparently unable to disassociate their warlike and interventionist sentiments from the barbarous treatment of their racial group in Europe. As much as I abhor racial and religious persecution, whether here or abroad, I am convinced that these columnists are not serving the best interests of America or their own race by impugning the motives of the isolationist Members of Congress and by their brazen attacks on the peace elements in America who insist on keeping out of foreign entanglements and wars.

One well-known columnist, for whom I have a high regard, insists that we must go to war in order to insure a supply of tin and rubber. That is a novel reason—a tin and rubber war. As Al Smith used to say, "Let us look at the record." The fact is that we can buy all the tin we want from Bolivia, without worrying about the tin produced in the East Indies or going to war with Japan. Germany is fighting a war without any natural rubber supply, but she is able to produce vast quantities of synthetic rubber. The Standard Oil Co. has just allocated a million dollars to build a plant in America to produce rubber out of oil, and believes this substitute will replace imported rubber within 5 years.

Another columnist wants us to go to war now in self-defense, as he is fearful of the German Navy if that nation wins, forgetful of the fact that every day Germany is losing more and more of its naval strength so that today the American Navy is six times as large and powerul as the German Navy.

Still another columnist tells us that we must go to war to make the world safe for democracy—the same old gag used in the World War. Another columnist inveighs against the dictatorial forms of government in foreign lands and urges us to make war on them. It is none of our business what form of government any foreign nation has, whether it is fascism in Italy, nazi-ism in Germany, communism in Soviet Russia, or an empire in Japan, nor is it any of their business what form of government exists in the United States of America.

None of these columnists tell us that our entrance into war would mean the black-out of American liberties, of our free institutions and constitutional form of government and the erection of a dictatorship in America as bad as the Fascists, Nazis, or Communists.

I do not question the right of "I do not want to go to war but" columnists to express their views fully, but they ought to wake up to the fact that their inspired propaganda is not fooling 95 percent of the American people, who have determined to keep out of foreign wars.

It is not a question of votes, or of being pro-British, pro-French, or pro-German. It is merely a question of being pro-American and being for America first, and for the security and best interests of our own people all the time. The American people are sympathetic to the Allies, and opposed to aggression and to dictatorships, but not to the extent of plowing under their sons on foreign battlefields, destroying our free institutions, and bankrupting the Nation for generations yet unborn.

There is nothing cowardly and craven in upholding the traditional American foreign policies proclaimed by George Washington of neutrality, nonintervention, no entangling alliances, and peace. Ninety-five percent of the American people believe in these policies, and they are neither cravens nor cowards—and whoever applies such epithets to them distorts the facts, misrepresents the will of the American people for peace, and brands himself as a war monger and an interventionist agitator and war propagandist. [Applause.]

SKILLED LABOR IN PRIVATE INDUSTRY

Mr. EDELSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDELSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced today a resolution calling for the appointment of a committee to ascertain the extent of the shortage of skilled labor in private industry and to study the methods which may be necessary to remedy this amazing paradox of a shortage of workers in the midst of 11,000,000 unemployed.

The necessity for such a committee and for such a study is shown by the numerous newspaper clippings which I hold in my hand and some of which I ask leave to print as an extension of my remarks. In addition, conferences were held with responsible people in the Office of Education and the Bureau of Labor Statistics which showed their awareness of the existence of this situation, their lack of knowledge of its precise limits, their desire for further statistics, and the admitted need for coordination of the work.

If the work of this committee should bear out the present general and somewhat vague knowledge of this problem it may result in a program which will in part diminish our relief and W. P. A. rolls by retraining people whose present skills are unwanted by private industry for unfilled jobs in private industry.

The shortage of skilled labor constitutes a double drag on our economic recovery. It hampers production and it requires relief expenditures which through the work of this committee will be replaced by adequate wages paid by private industry.

There can be no doubt that industry will support the establishment of a committee to study this problem. The newspaper clippings that I have already referred to show that organized labor likewise will support the objectives of this resolution. The reduction in relief which may be realized from this study will win approval of the public.

The resolution calls for an appropriation of only $50,000, which is an extremely modest sum for a project as ambitious as this one. While the various interested departments and agencies will give their wholehearted cooperation, it will be necessary for the committee to make additional and independent studies of its own.

The work of the proposed committee will not duplicate in any way that of Senator O'MAHONEY's committee. The main purpose of the T. N. E. C. is to study the extent and effect of the concentration of economic power in this country. It is true that last month the T. N. E. C. began hearings on technological unemployment but that does not relate to an effort to put people back to work.

The basic principle behind this resolution is that we must develop new skills among the unemployed rather than merely keep alive their old and unwanted skills.

I trust that this resolution will be promptly referred to this House for action. I feel sure that if considered, it will be approved. [Applause.]

IDLE SKILLED WORKERS' CHANCES IMPROVE

The unemployed worker living in St. Louis or St. Louis County who is qualified for some type of job had a 63 percent better chance of getting that job through the Missouri State Employment Service during the first quarter of 1940 than during the same period last year, according to placement figures of the St. Louis district office of the State agency made available yesterday by C. R. Kammerer, manager. Placements in private employment, the figures disclose, totaled 7,086, as compared with 4,317 for the corresponding months last year.

Kammerer said that his office was having difficulty in finding a sufficient number of qualified workers needed at the present time in the skilled trades. "We have jobs available right now for skilled machinists able to set up their own machines and for tool and die makers," he explained.

The facilities of the employment service are free to both the employer and the employee.

BROAD RELIEF VIEW

Extension by the department of assistance of credit under the Pierson Act to relief recipients who enroll in vocational courses or special training projects is intended as a stimulus to practical education.

Many of those on relief have found themselves handicapped in hunting jobs by their lack of skill, for the surplus is of unskilled labor.

This handicap can be removed through proper training. The feeling that the necessary time for it could not be given is removed by the department's order, which encourages jobless to enroll in such courses.

Willingness to take such training—enrollment is entirely voluntary—cannot be looked upon as a shirking of responsibility, but is, rather, a courageous attempt of the individual to improve his lot.

The probability is that it will cost comparatively little to train many of the unskilled sufficiently for them to qualify for and hold skilled jobs. In formulating such a program the department of assistance is viewing its obligation in a broad light and attacking one of the fundamentals of the relief problem.

WHERE WORKERS ARE SCARCE

You have to be 40 years old or older to remember a news article like the one in the Press yesterday: Such is the shortage of skilled workers in certain metal trades of Cleveland that boys are leaving the technical high schools before they finish their training. Arrangements are being made for them to continue their class work at night.

Not since 1917–20 has the demand for workers of all-around skill been expressed in just that way.

The appearance of these islands of labor scarcity in the great ocean of unemployment is one of the surprises of these times. It may even mystify some. Why, with 96,000 persons out of work in Cuyahoga County, should there be a scarcity of any type of worker?

The explanation is to be found in the absence of apprentice training in the decade of depression, plus the sudden demands this year for men capable of meeting the close requirements of work on airplane parts and machine tools. Probably there are many men of considerable skill in the metal industries who are still unemployed, and for them some facility ought to be provided whereby they can bring up their long disused training to the levels of modern industrial requirements.

In the meantime, we hope not many older people will begrudge to these youths the opportunity to get jobs in skilled occupations in something like the proportions at which older people are now employed in them. It will take a long time before the number of young men in the upper ranges of skill even approaches the proportions which existed only 10 or 20 years ago.

HOW TO STRENGTHEN OUR DEFENSE

National defense expenditures may rise $500,000,000 next year. The money may go for additional troops and their equipment, including planes, tanks, trucks, all the new machinery of war. But this is the era of total wars, a period in which every war becomes a war of opposing economies supporting the opposing armies. It is proper, therefore, to ask whether the $500,000,000 might not insure our defense better if it were spent on training our youth for skilled jobs. For such a program would not only strengthen our defense but would also strengthen our economy should the defense need never come.

Industrial resources are not measured by plant alone. We have plant and the resources with which to increase our plant. What we do not have in adequate supply is the human skill needed to operate an enlarged plant. War—any kind of war—would sharply intensify the demand for skilled men.

An aviation force rests on the ability to produce planes, not on the number of planes standing in hangars. Mechanized units depend for effectiveness on the ability to make quick replacements. It is important to note that industry is already experiencing difficulty in finding skilled men to handle the increased activity of recent months.

But 500,000 young men and women enter the labor market each year, enter it without skills and without the prospect of acquiring skills.

Would it not be a true strengthening of national defense to spend a major share of the $500,000,000 increase on the training of the Nation's youth for vital, highly skilled work in the national industry?

Frieda S. Miller, State industrial commissioner, reports a shortage of tool makers, machinists, and machine operators in the industrial centers of Albany, Utica, Syracuse, Rochester, Buffalo. Miss Miller says this has been apparent for several years, as men have left the field because of a lack of jobs to find other work, while training of apprentices has been sharply curtailed.

During the upturn of 1937 the Labor Department at Washington reported that business ran into a shortage of skilled personnel as soon as it picked up to about 80 percent of normal activity. "The rate of business recovery," it noted, "is quite likely to be more rapid than existing training facilities." It found, in a study applicable to 6,600,000 job seekers, that almost a fourth (23.6 percent) had no industrial background; they had either no work experience or had been unemployed 4 years or more. Those under 21 had the most difficulty securing jobs.

A study in Business Week for November 4 recites the position of the aviation industry, which has 45,000 trained workers and seems likely to need 100,000 by spring. Germany has trained 200,000 aviation workers, four times the number available here.

The National Industrial Conference Board, also in a study made during the 1937 rise, found that 27 percent of metal-working establishments reported "extreme labor scarcity."

PRACTICAL JOB FINDING

With the cooperation of business and industrial leaders and trade schools, Connecticut has been making real advancement during the past few months in meeting the unemployment problem. This is the result of a definite campaign under the auspices of the State authorities.

New positions have been found for 35,000 persons since the movement was started, and there is confidence that, as the plan is pursued, much further inroads will be made in the ranks of the jobless.

One of the policies followed by the State is to encourage training of youth for the skilled trades. It is generally admitted that unemployment is most prevalent among common laborers, men and women, too, who have not had the advantage of preparation for the new lines of work in which the chief demand for help now is found. Connecticut, as an industrial State, takes cognizance of this phase of the labor situation; and with the cooperation of manufacturing leaders is stressing those occupations which offer the greatest response to the call for workers.

This campaign has been in progress but a short time. The greater benefits will come with the accumulation of results.

Connecticut's practical success may suggest to California that the idea has more to offer than the "production for use" theory to which Governor Olson is devoting so much energy and enthusiasm. Production for use, it has been pointed out, will take away one job for every job that it creates. The need is a large net gain in working positions, and it may well be that the same effort devoted to the Connecticut plan would yield real results at much less cost than production for use. In any event it offers possibilities that merit an earnest trial to bring employers and the State into close relations in attempts to open new avenues of employment.

[From the Paterson (N. J.) Call of December 18, 1939]

SKILLED WORKERS ARE NEEDED BY INDUSTRIES ALL OVER STATE

A statement which should be interesting to the hundreds of persons who are registering for the series of 4 weeks' courses in mechanics to be given at the Paterson Vocational School was that made on Saturday by John Rapp, manager of the Bayonne office of the New Jersey State employment service; namely, that jobs for skilled workers in this State are going begging.

The mechanics, declared Mr. Rapp, are being sought by industries within a 25-mile radius of that city who are badly in need of skilled help. It appears that the State employment commission recently advertised in Bayonne newspapers for 10 days for an unlimited number of skilled workers without receiving a single application.

Similar conditions are found in various sections of the State where industries are located, a clear indication that there are not enough skilled, and for that matter, semiskilled, workers.

Paterson is meeting this situation in a practical way by initiating short courses for the training of workers so as to make them suitable for employment in local industries that require this kind of help, and it is expected that by the time the course is completed some 500 men will be available for jobs that require this kind of training. The plan was suggested to the local board of education by James F. Mason, director of the Edison vocational school, and as its value was instantly recognized by board members the course has been initiated and should be a boon to men seeking employment in industries requiring trained help.

[From the New York Sun of December 27, 1939]

TO PROVIDE SKILLED LABOR

For uncounted numbers of the jobless the present offers only dependence on some form of relief or private charity, and the future is clouded by the question whether the man or the woman can retain the skill developed in previous occupations. Recent reports of a shortage of skilled labor in certain industries have raised this question for employers and for those concerned with current social problems arising from serious unemployment. In Management Record the National Industrial Conference Board reports that the skilled labor supply has been reduced markedly in metal-working industries because training there requires considerable time. An inquiry addressed mainly to companies engaged in metal working brought out a lack of certain types of craftsmen. Of 180 companies, 122 said that a substantial increase in their activity would undoubtedly raise a serious labor problem and many others agreed that for them also such would probably be the result. The textile industries have a shortage of loom fixers and weavers; the cabinet-making trade a shortage of woodworking draftsmen and cabinet-makers.

The United States Chamber of Commerce has also reported on replies to an inquiry on skilled labor. It declares that the decline of apprenticeship training is the most common cause of labor shortages. The chamber's report added that work relief has contributed to the loss of skill in instances where the relief employees have been engaged for 2 or 3 years in occupations entirely different from those by which they earned their living in private employment.

Several schemes are being tried in the effort to overcome the causes of a decline in a number of certain kinds of skilled labor. The consequences should be threefold: Individual workmen now idle will take their places as useful members of society; the trades which require their skills will be able to maintain production, and the number dependent on Federal, State, or municipal aid will decrease.

The New York Building Trades Employers' Association has been represented on a committee with the Building and Construction Trades Council of New York and the Building Congress to devise an apprenticeship system. The object of this is to train the required number for various skilled occupations, but also to establish some satisfactory control, to prevent an excess of one type of apprentice and a shortage of another. In Connecticut Governor Baldwin's administration has been working with industry to train, in trade schools, both the young and inexperienced and the "skill rusty" in a program which the Governor has described as originating with business. The effects of apprenticeship systems must be studied carefully with respect to hampering restrictions in the Wage and Hour Act.

TOOL MAKING A DYING ART—SURVEY SHOWS TRADE NEEDS YOUTH—SKILLED WORKMEN'S AGE AVERAGES 45

(By Stanley H. Page)

Tool making, a basic trade upon which the machine age rests, is rapidly becoming a lost art in the Newark industrial section as well as throughout the United States. This is indicated by a survey of large manufacturing concerns and tool and die plants.

Inquiry reveals there is practically no new generation of these highly skilled workmen in the making. Apprenticeships virtually went out of existence 20 years ago and there is no indication they will be revived.

Engineering science has increased machine efficiency to the point where tolerances allowed the tool maker have been reduced almost to zero. The tool maker's skill has become more important than ever, yet obtaining this skill is already a major problem in industry. Heads of tool manufacturing concerns predict, if the present trend continues, in another 20 years industry will be practically bankrupt of these workmen.

AVERAGE ABOUT 45

Heads of tool-making plants hereabouts say the average age of the men who make the machines for industry is about 45. If you visit the shops, you will not find more than a half dozen young men at the benches—nearly all appear more than 50.

The tool maker falls in the category of a skilled laborer. Actually, he is practically an artist. He works with steel, paring it down with lathes, drilling it and shaping it with the finest files. His work often must be accurate to within .0002 of an inch, less than one-third the thickness of a human hair.

Nobody would expect a man to wield the first brush he ever handled and produce a superb painting in oils, or to pick up a violin and produce the music of a master—for exactly the same reason a tool maker cannot be made overnight. His talent is developed over years. During that period he is a nonproducer, both for himself and for the man to whom he apprentices himself.

APPRENTICE 3 YEARS

The average tool maker's apprenticeship is 3 years, but he is not considered a par workman under 6. This is because the experience gained in several shops, where every task and problem may be encountered, is necessary before he reaches the top of his skill. When he is a completely qualified workman, he can read blueprints as well as the engineer who drew them, and his work must follow the plans to the last infinitesimal detail.

Youths under 20 used to be apprenticed to the tool and die shops. There they worked at less than a living wage, a drain upon the resources of their families and upon their employer as well. Today the apprentice is paid approximately $12 a week. Eventually if he becomes an expert he may get top wages averaging $1.25 an hour, or $52.50 a week. Most tool makers earn 90 cents an hour, or $37.80 a week.

DRAWN TO BETTER PAY

From 1920 to 1930 young men refused to make this sacrifice to learn a trade. Instead they could obtain jobs driving trucks or any sort of rough labor that paid them $30 to $40 a week. Semiskilled labor paid more and could be learned quickly. The tool manufacturers were willing to take apprentices in the twenties, but American youth was drawn by better-paying jobs.

The period from 1930 to 1940 saw an entirely different situation. There were plenty of youths walking the streets, anxious to learn a trade, but the employers, struggling in the depression, no longer held out the opportunity. They saw it was too expensive with $2,000 in salary alone for an apprentice, salary to which must be added the time of other workmen taken up in instruction.

With a pick-up in jobs already noted, the tool-making industry enters what may prove to be a new phase. This will be discussed in tomorrow's article.

[From the Seattle (Wash.) Post-Intelligencer of January 6, 1940]

INDUSTRY'S NEED: TRAINED WORKERS

Industrial recovery is bringing to public attention the lack of skilled labor in many trades.

The country will soon have to pay for the decline of apprenticeship during the depressed early thirties.

In the circumstances management, labor unions, and government, recognizing the importance of a competent labor supply in national defense as well as in general industry, should accelerate plans for training newcomers.

Seattle has recently seen two interesting developments.

One is the building-trades classes for apprentices, sponsored jointly by contractors, building-trade unions, and Seattle school authorities.

Another is the arrangement made by the Boeing Aircraft Co. with the school administration, under which selected youths are being given special training at Edison Vocational School to prepare them for Boeing jobs.

As a stopgap remedy, an innovation in Hartford, Conn., is attracting Nation-wide attention.

Recognizing that in these abnormal times all industries do not move ahead at the same time, United Aircraft Corporation, busy with war orders, and Underwood-Elliott-Fisher, expecting no immense expansion in orders, have worked out a cooperative plan whereby the latter will lend the former manpower.

In need of experienced machinists and other skilled workers, the airplane maker will temporarily borrow surplus labor from the typewriter concern.

The employees of the typewriter concern will not interrupt their seniority record with their regular employer.

Employers will exchange workers in an orderly and friendly manner, instead of raiding one another's staffs.

In case the volume of orders should rise considerably in the typewriter field, it is understood that Underwood can draw from partially trained workers from Governor Baldwin's State school mechanics training program.

The arrangement at Hartford awakens the country to a realization that trained manpower, instead of being a drug on the market, really constitutes a nation's No. 1 asset.

[From the Grand Rapids (Mich.) Press of March 27, 1940]

JOBS THAT GO BEGGING

With millions of persons jobless there are nevertheless more than 250,000 jobs going begging. Dr. A. H. Edgerton, director of vocational guidance at the University of Wisconsin, has been informing the country. He bases his figures on surveys that he has conducted through the past year and concludes that this figure may be exceeded now with improved business conditions.

The reason these vacancies are unfilled, he explains, is because there is a lack of adequately trained applicants. Opportunities, Dr. Edgerton declares, never were so plentiful for the thoroughly and flexibly trained, adaptable worker as they will be in the next few years. But, he adds, there will be less and less demand for the untrained worker—for the one incapable of acquiring new skill and knowledge.

"There never was a time when it was so dangerous for a worker to get in a rut," this vocational expert declares.

From a study extending over a dozen years Dr. Edgerton has been able to classify occupations in two divisions, one in which prospects are limited, and the other in which a wealth of opportunity exists. For the young man attention to these classes may prove valuable.

In the limited class this expert places aviation, radio, small farming, mining, engineering, acting, metropolitan journalism, library management, fine arts, architects, law, medicine, music, social work, teaching, and numerous others. This does not mean that there is no opportunity in these fields; in most cases it merely means they are overcrowded and that unless the young man has a particular bent in these directions he had better steer clear of them.

Unlimited possibilities still exist, Dr. Edgerton states, in metallurgy, accounting, banking, farm management, certain forms of retailing, commercial designing, business administration, salesmanship, industrial and scientific research, city management and planning, dietetics, industrial chemistry, and so forth.

This list, of course, is by no means complete. It simply indicates some of the lines which seem to offer for the present and the future the widest fields. The greater emphasis remains, however, on the necessity for adequate training, no matter what line of endeavor is to be followed. And that goes right down to the less technical jobs in shop and office.

Through the last few years it has not been the skilled and adaptable worker who has suffered. For the most part unemployment has been among those who lack the training necessary to meet the opportunities that are offered. The skilled worker also is better able to create new jobs and opportunities for himself.

The answer to the unemployment problem therefore seems not merely one of finding more jobs, but one of training men for the job as well.

[From the Greensboro (N. C.) News of April 22, 1940]

NOTE ON BEGGING

Via the Raleigh Times comes information of revealment by the State employment service that 47 jobs, which require degrees of technical skill and which, in some instances, pay more than $400 per month, are going begging. No qualified applicants have put in their appearance.

And that situation, which crops up in reports, surveys, and news items ever and anon, sends us off into an abiding field of rumination. To what extent can our unemployment problem be attributed to maladjustments in the employment field itself, with emphasis upon training therein rather than to a mere surplus of labor in the aggregate? In thinking upon that question one must consider vocational training, or lack thereof, as it exists in the schools and as it has been furthered or retarded, in some instances deliberately blocked, by well-nigh monopolistic groups of skilled labor and artisans themselves.

There is manifested a woeful lack of knowledge of existing and changing trends which should reveal where labor surpluses and labor shortages obtain, of correlation of economic programs and educational policies with labor and employment needs. How largely are we going ahead training boys and girls for work in fields which are overcrowded or which are retrogressing? What guidance is being offered, what shifts are being made to meet and take advantages of new conditions, new opportunities, new demands? It is a sorry commentary upon all the surveys, the investigations, and the fact-finding commissions made and authorized by endless public agencies at the cost of untold millions of dollars that the data gathered seem to remain an inchoate mass, that out of them order and intelligent application in the field which has provided the basic problem of all problems, unemployment, are yet to come.

Why must jobs—a single job—go begging for men while millions of men in turn go begging for bread?

[From the Oakland (Calif.) Tribune of April 26, 1940]

PLANE PLANT STILL NEEDS MEN—BURBANK FACTORY HAS JOBS FOR 3,000 TO AID FILLING WAR CONTRACT

Echoes of World War II's gunfire were heard in metropolitan Oakland today—in an unprecedented demand for 3,000 skilled artisans "wanted immediately" to build war planes.

In 4 days 600 men have already been assured jobs and 100 more will probably be placed before the week ends. Eight to 10 percent of these men who will be employed to supply the sinews of war come from the W. P. A. and S. R. A. relief rolls, statistics showed.

In the role of big employer is the Lockheed Aircraft Corporation, of Burbank, Calif., which has a backlog of $57,000,000 in war-plane orders from Uncle Sam and European belligerents and already employs 40,000 men.

ADVERTISING PLACED

The search for skilled workers in northern California originated with California's State Department of Employment, according to Mrs. Kathryn T. Bangs, manager of the local office at 530 Eighteenth Street.

Lockheed officials doubted that they could find the 3,000 men needed within the State. But the State employment office prevailed upon them to try, and agreed to render yeoman aid.

So it was that this classified advertisement appeared in the Tribune last Saturday:

"Wanted—3,000 skilled workers for aviation industry * * *."

ENGINEERS NEEDED

These are the types of workers needed: Civil, electrical, and mechanical engineers; checkers; detailers; tool designers; tool makers; loftsmen; template men; machinists; turret-lathe milling-machine men; Lucas boring-mill operators; drop-hammer and screw-machine operators, hand and automatic; cabinetmakers; pattern makers, metal and plastic; continental and zinc die casters.

Illustrative of the scope of this "call to work," applicants have come to Oakland from as far south as San Diego—hired by the Lockheed plants—and as far north as Yreka.

SEVEN HUNDRED CERTIFIED

The State employment office has already certified 700 men to company officials here as equipped by training and experience to hold the jobs, H. J. Rose, supervising interviewer, said.

But Robert Storment, personnel director for Lockheed, is conducting further tests for the applicants at the Central Trades School. They must pass physical, temperament, and I. Q. tests before being accepted.

OLDER MEN HIRED

The company examinations will be held at the school today and possibly tomorrow. They started here on Tuesday.

Next week the search for 3,000 men who want jobs will go to Sacramento on Monday, Stockton on Tuesday, and Palo Alto on Wednesday. The balance of the week will be spent in San Francisco.

Many of the 3,000 jobs are going to middle-aged and older men, for there have been few apprentices in the skilled trades during the depression years, and so youth is not qualified.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and insert the newspaper clippings I have referred to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DARDEN of Virginia, for Thursday, on account of engagement out of city.

To Mr. FRIES, indefinitely, on account of death in family.

To Mr. RANDOLPH, for 5 days, on account of public business.

To Mr. THORKELSON, from May 13 to June 8, on account of important business.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that, when consideration of the Senate amendments to the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill still in disagreement is resumed, three amendments be taken up out of their regular order: First, No. 99, on parity; second, No. 100, on surplus commodities; and third, Nos. 101, 102, and 103, on farm tenancy, and that the remainder of the amendments be considered in the order in which they appear in the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include a telegram received from the Chamber of Commerce of Sioux City, Iowa.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

SENATE BILL REFERRED

A bill of the Senate of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

S. 3828. An act to amend section 107 of the Judicial Code, as amended, to eliminate the requirement that suitable accommodations for holding the court at Winchester, Tenn., be provided by the local authorities; to the Committee on the Judiciary.
